Safety Drive Study Offered High Schools

State-Wide Campaign to Give Instruction to Needy Students

A complete course of instruction in how to drive an automobile safely and operate it efficiently is being made available to every high school and high school student in the state of Oregon.

Announcement of this latest step in a state-wide campaign of traffic safety education was released today by Secretary of State Earl Snell, as he disclosed the publication of an authorized state edition of "Man and the Motor Car," a 265-page text book on good driving and traffic safety. This book, published with the cooperation of the National Conservation bureau of New York will supplement the forthcoming revised edition of "Are Young Drivers Good Drivers?", to be issued soon by the safety division of the department of state and the department of public instruction.

The text book contains 16 chapters. The first presents a history of the automobile from the emergence of the "horseless buggy" to the powerful streamlined cars that sweep over America's highways today. Then follow chapters on what makes the car go, how to drive, a discussion of the driver and his nature, studies of highways, codes of the road, the art of driving, driving under special conditions, driving in traffic, how to maintain a car, a discussion of automobile accidents, the pedestrian problem, a glimpse of the future of motoring, and several paragraphs showing the necessity for good driving.

"When we teach large numbers of future drivers how to drive, and give them a basic understanding of the forces which influence an automobile under all conditions, we shall have taken a long step toward ridding our highways of death, injury and property destruction," Snell said. "Through adequate and interesting instruction while students are still in high school, we hope to make good drivers of them before they graduate, and thereby establish a new generation of superior automobile drivers."

Owing to the limited number of books available, it will be impossible to make any general distribution of the new publication.
