Crop Harvesting To Need Many

More than 60,000 women and children aided in the harvesting of Oregon crops for the 1942 season and yet more will be needed this year, was the consensus of reports from the United States employment service in a two-day session with the state agricultural advisory committee in Salem last week.

During last season only 35,548 of the 97,373 farm placements made by the USES were men over 18 the reports showed. More than two-thirds of the farm workers placed were from the local communities, while 22 per cent were from Oregon points and 10 per cent from out of the state. With rationing and other travel restrictions, the proportion of out-of-state workers is expected to be further reduced in 1943.

Bright Side Stressed

The bright side of the picture, however, was stressed by L. C. Stoll area director for the war manpower commission, who said that a leveling off of labor demands by several shipyards and the letdown in cantonment and other construction might help farmers in securing experienced year-round machine men.

"Oregon more than met its production quotas last year, and I do not believe that any farmer need hesitate about planting still more essential crops this year," Stoll said. However, several things must be done, agreed the conferees, to achieve a fuller utilization and better distribution of labor.

New Program Explained

Included in the new program, ac-

ording to Emory R. Worth, state director of the USES, will be: a publicity and advertising campaign; more adequate training supervision and wholesome "on-the-job" surroundings for teen-aged boys and girls; better housing facilities for workers; stronger effort to curb drunkenness and other forms of absenteeism; more active solicitation for clubs, church groups and organizations, etc., to share the responsibilities in the battle of food production.

J. J. Fisher, manager of the Gresham Berry Growers, Inc., was elected chairman of the farm advisory group and Worth was chosen secretary. The committee, representing farm groups in all parts of the state, was welcomed by Douglas Mullarky, representing Governor Snell. The committee plans another meeting sometime in early February.
