Those Who Are In It

range. For 15 minutes at about 10-second intervals our ship was straddled with shell bursts and believe me I was sweating. We finally got out if it by knocking out their guns and when we left at the end of the day Wake Island was one big mess of smoke and fire.

"Then it was back to Pearl Harbor for a short stay before we left again for another big raid this time occupation of the Gilbert Islands, but this time we were sort of bringing up the rear. First we left with a bunch of landing barges which were to be held in reserve for reinforcements. We took them down to the island of Funafuti which is about 70 miles south of the Gilberts. We stayed there for about five days waiting until they sent word for us. While there the Japs came over on a bombing mission. They bombed mostly the landing strip on the island. We were anchored off shore and dared not fire for fear of giving our position away. Then we would have been an easy target for them. Just the same we had to be at our battle stations and got very little sleep. During the day we would go over on the beach and pick coconuts and look at the funny looking natives. When we finally did head for the Gilberts the battle was in full swing but when we got there things were pretty well under control so again we just anchored off shore. And again the Japs came over every night, not once but three and four times a night and again we got very little sleep. After about a week of that we left for Pearl Harbor and again without any casualties."
