Several Poisons Rout House Ants

No longer is it necessary for homemakers to suffer from invasions of house ants, says Dr. Don C. Mote, O.S.C. entomologist, in a brief mimeographed circular of information giving directions for control of these pests.

The best material to use depends on the circumstances and upon the kinds of ants doing the damage, says Dr. Mote. If the colony headquarters can be located, carbon bisulphide is recommended. The best all-round poison yet found is tartar emetic combined either with cheap syrup or sometimes with bacon rind or grease.

Sodium fluoride and Paris green are other poisons that are used effectively at times, while 5 percent DDT in kerosene or 10 per cent powder will control certain species effectively. Directions for using these are given in the station circular of information No. 388 free at any extension office.

... and EFFECT

This little act of carelessness is responsible for approximately one fourth of our forest fires, No. 1 enemy of the woods.

But the direct money loss isn't the greatest danger. Worse is the fact that lands frequently burned over lose their capacity for reproduction. America needs productive forest lands, not fire-blackened wastes, for America needs the things forests produce.
