NEW STEP LIGHT FOR HOME SAFETY

It's dark at the top of the basement stairs, and Mother doesn't see that Fluffy has left a choice bone there for her trip over.—

There's no outside light on the Brown's garage, and the prowler who waited there to lift Mr. Brown's wallet after he had put the car away on a dark night, knew it.—

If Sue had taken the time to draw a floor lamp up beside the sewing machine for that few minutes of evening sewing, her finger and the needle wouldn't have tangled like they did.—

Because so many of these home accidents, which happen every day, could be avoided by having proper light at the right spot, lighting specialists have listed a number of simple rules for safety lighting in the home.

1. Provide a light at all outdoor entrances to the home. And if the front porch is a wide one, it needs a light over the steps as well as one at the door.

2. Have some sort of outdoor lighting, preferably controlled from the house as well as the garage. If your garage is not wired, locate a projector flood light on the corner of the house at second-story height so that it illuminates both driveway and garage entrance.

3. Light is needed at the top and bottom of all stairways to lessen the possibility of falls. The important thing is to have the entire stairway illuminated.

4. Any motor-driven equipment such as sewing machine, washing machine, or work bench machines need light directed on it, when in use, to avoid nicked or mashed fingers.

5. A tiny night light whose operating cost for a whole year a matter of pennies, should be left burning all night in bathrooms halls or stairways, especially if there are invalids, small children or aged persons in the family.

Along the lines of safety lighting, have you seen the new step light, which can be fitted into the riser or any stairstep? It consists of a small box containing a six-watt light shaded with louvres and can be fitted into almost any stairway where electrical connections are available.

Modern home builders are using them in those one-step-down living rooms to remind guests of the step, and in outdoor terraces and porches where there is no overhead light. They could also be used at the top and bottom of attic and basement stairs.

Every year about 30,000 earthquakes of measurable intensity are recorded, mostly in the areas bordering the Pacific Ocean.
