Better Pastures Aim in 6 Counties

Developing and improving 75,000 acres of productive pasture a year on cutover hill areas and low-lying coastal lands will be the main objective of the agricultural conservation program in six western Oregon counties, according to Arnold N. Bodtker, chief of fieldmen for the state PMA committee.

Plans were made at a district conference of AAA committeemen from Columbia, Tillamook, Clatsop, Lincoln, Coos and Curry counties for using a major portion of a $250,000 1947 conservation practice budget on pasture improvement work. The methods worked out for the coastal area will have application in other parts of the state where more and better pastures are needed, Bodtker believes.

Standards to assure lasting conservation benefits for each practice dollar were worked out by the committeemen, assisted by SCS, Oregon State college experiment station specialists, and county extension agents. Proper preparation of a seedbed will be stressed. For cutover hill areas, this will include burning, slashing, and removal of logs where practicable. Drainage, leveling and plowing will be emphasized for low-lying lands. Seeding of adapted mixtures of perennial grasses and legumes approved by the county agent will be required for both greater and cropland pastures.

Greater emphasis will be placed on management practices to maintain pastures developed under the program, Bodtker reported. These include adequate fencing to permit controlled grazing that will keep down brush, spot burning and reseeding where necessary, and deferred grazing to provide a "rest period." The maintenance program for cropland pastures includes use of lime, manure, and nitrogen and phosphate fertilizers, rotational grazing, and clipping.
