Flashing Blue Light Explained

The secretary of state's traffic safety division joined the state highway commission today in warning Oregon motorists of danger ahead when a flashing blue light is seen on wintry highways.

The blue light, the division said, signals that snow plowing and sanding equipment is at work and that drivers should proceed with extra caution. Such equipment may be encountered at any time in mountain areas during the winter months.

Vehicles displaying the blue light should be given the right of way the division said, and no attempt to pass should be made in flying snow while the big rotary plows are in operation. Highway department officials said most mishaps involving snow removal equipment occur when motorists overdrive visibility and road conditions, failing to stop or slow down in time to avoid a collision.

period between the mailing of the order to report for induction, and the actual date of induction. "Everything is being done," concluded Colonel Mason, "to make it possible for any registrant, who, for some personal reasons, may desire the earliest possible induction, to be inducted almost immediately. This procedure does not interfere in any way with a registrant's opportunity to enlist in some other branch of the service before he has been ordered to take his physical examination.

New Draft Order Alters Procedure

State headquarters, selective service system for Oregon, announces that instructions have been received permitting voluntary induction of registrants from 18 to 26, if acceptable to the armed forces.

"Up until this time," said Colonel Francis W. Mason, deputy state director, "a registrant had to wait until his number came up in regular sequence. This has worked a distinct hardship on many young men, whose work is of such nature that after their being found acceptable to the armed forces, following the physical examination, it has been difficult for them to find remunerative work during the period between this examination and actual induction.

"Now," continued Colonel Mason, "upon written request to his local board, any registrant, if not obviously disqualified, may be physically examined with the next group being forwarded by the board, and then inducted under the next call."

Colonel Mason went on to point out that instructions have been issued also to all local boards to permit registrants to waive the 21-day waiting period between the mailing of the notice of acceptability and/or the 10-day
