

AROUND THE FARM

Back in 1948 Thurman Jeffries, Yankton, used the salt treatment on green Douglas fir posts set out in his raspberry field. Most of the posts were 6 to 8 inches in diameter.

This summer Jeffries took out part of his raspberry field and the posts pulled out of this field gave us a lot of good information about the effectiveness of this salt treatment.

The salt treatment is actually a mixture of corrosive sublimate and common table salt. Some of the mixture is applied to the post by putting it in a hole bored at the gravel line. The theory is that the chemical will move out into the wood and prevent decay.

Jeffries posts showed that the chemicals moved down the post very well but it moved only a short distance to the sides from the holes where it was originally put. The result was that about one-third of the post was solid but the remainder was badly rotted. The chemical moved about two inches to each side of the hole where it was originally put.

Here are Jeffries comments on post treatment as a result of his experience. He feels that the salt treatment is not effective unless several holes are bored around the post and the treatment split up among the various holes. He would suggest at least 3 holes for a 6-inch post. Four might be better.

Considering the time and trouble in boring the additional holes, Jeffries suggests that peeling, curing and treating posts with a cold soak of "penta" solution might be better where a large number of posts will be needed.

Mrs. Clair Devine and children motored to Delena last Friday to visit her mother, Mrs. Gordon.

He makes one more point. The tops on his salt treated posts were beginning to show a lot of rot. "Penta" treatment applied to seasoned posts can be also applied to the top to prevent rot.

A sweet tooth for a ripe strawberry gets young coyotes into trouble at Adolph Anlicker's, Deer Island.

Following strawberry harvest young coyotes visit the field in the early evening to pick up remaining berries. The pups are just getting big enough to forage for themselves at that time of year and the fruit is easy pickings.

Anlicker uses a special high power .22 caliber rifle and gets right out in the field. Engrossed in gobbling up berries the young coyotes become careless and fail to notice a man standing perfectly still. They will occasionally raise up their head to look around and that is when they line up with the business end of Anlicker's rifle.
