This may be a surprise to you, as it was to us when word came to The Eagle Monday from Elmer Bergerson. He writes that the water moccasin (poisonous snake) is quite prevalent in the Buxton area and more especially on the Quincy M. Fowler property which is known as the Charles Morgan berry farm.

One or two per year are killed by Charles Morgan and while planting potatoes, one was placed in a bucket for identification, but escaped. This snake is reported as being more poisonous than a rattler, but not aggressive, he writes.

They are black rubbery color on the back, very yellow underneath and dubbed off where a rattler carries rattles so that they are often called a double-headed snake because one must look closely to distinguish between head and tail. Parents should warn their children about the possibility of this snake, he warns, and we agree that people should familiarize themselves with the markings so they will be able to identify and avoid the danger.

Talk that the more-than-usual rains this spring in the Northwest are the result of noise and effects of the Nevada atomic blasts is simply a modern version of an old argument, according to an Oregon state college physicist. There is absolutely no evidence that rain and explosions are related, Dr. Fred W. Decker says.

The theory that noise brings rain is hundreds of years old, he says, because it was believed centuries ago that the noise of war brought rain since downpours often followed battles. The explanation came forth, however, that preparations for the battle and the actual combat were planned for the fair weather. It was only natural that an ordinary change of weather would follow.

This summer is not too unlike the one of 1946 when clouds and rain were more usual than sunny skies and the entire summer was more like the usual weather of the fall or winter. There were no atomic blasts then to account for the condition.

Today's controversy over the atomic blasts has brought agreement from experts that the unusual weather was not caused by the A-bombs.
