Candid Forestry BY B.M.

IDEAL FORESTRY IS WHERE NATURE RESEEDS LOGGED LANDS. WINGED SEEDS MAY TRAVEL LONG DISTANCES FROM PARENT TREE, BORN BY HOT, DRY WINDS TO FERTILE SOIL. NINE OUT OF TEN ACRES LOGGED ARE RESEEDING IN THIS MANNER.

Douglas Fir Forests Decrease in Production of Annual Seed Crop

Not since 1949 have the Pacific Northwest Douglas fir forests produced a good crop of seed. Artificial reforestation in Washington and Oregon is threatened with a temporary decrease in its rapid momentum of the last decade. A drop in the usually prolific natural regeneration of this species is expected for a year or two.

Foresters in need of five tons of Douglas fir seed a year for use in northwest nurseries and for direct seeding from helicopter, find their cupboards are bare, said W. D. Hagenstein, industrial forestry association chief forester.

"We generally get a good seed year in four," Hagenstein stated, "about three times in ten years. Hemlock and cedar are much more regular seed producers, for they produce good seed crops eight out of every ten years."

During light seed years like 1953, the forest leader said, the output of seed is just barely enough to feed the rodents and insects and little if any is left to produce new trees. Result is that natural regeneration is less than average during such years.

Hagenstein observed that rodents especially savor the relatively large—40,000 to a pound—Douglas fir seeds. Hemlock and cedar seeds are only about a tenth as large, requiring from 300,000 to 400,000 to make a pound.

Foresters store seed during good years, he pointed out, but the poor seed crops for several years in a row has nearly exhausted seed reserves. "What the Douglas fir region needs most," Hagenstein said, "is a bumper seed crop in 1954."

OUT OF THE WOODS . . .

Ep Hoyt Country

The news that the Society of American Foresters is to hold its 1953 annual convention in Colorado Springs, September 14-17, has set me to thinking about Ep Hoyt. Colorado is his country now. There he is publisher of the Denver Post and a top-hand "golf crony" of President Eisenhower.

Some of us knew Ep when he was an Oregonian reporter, with a sideline of Western fiction. I'll never forget his cowboy story hero who had a glass eye. It looked very cold but right real and he could eject it from the socket at will without raising a hand. This got him out of many a tough spot.

Once Ep let his hero be trapped at a cowtown bar, with a jigger of whiskey in his left hand. The dirty guy of the story had his thumb twitching back for the hammer of his .45, but before he could fan it he was startled to see the cowboy's left eye pop forth, curve down, and splash into the whiskey glass. For a split second his thumb went limp. It was all the time the cowboy hero needed to draw his own revolver. A gun went "Kapow!" and it was the dirty guy who took the bloody fall.

"Mighty good readin', folks. "Nature on Edge"

The official boss of all the nation's foresters is SAF President George L. Drake of Shelton, Washington. Albert Ernst of Auburn, Washington, is chairman of the Public Relations Division of the Society. E. F. Heacock of Tacoma, W. D. Hagenstein, Clarence Richen, Kendall B. Wood and E. J. Dunford of Portland, Drs. Philip G. Haddock and Walter H. Schaeffer of Seattle, and Dr. Walter F. McCulloch and John B. Grantham of Corvallis, Oregon. All have prominent places on the program for Colorado Springs.

Forestry Boss Drake and his fellow thinkers-up have chosen "Nature on Edge" as the convention theme. It was made for a state where the natives like to drawl. "Spread Colorado out flat and she would be a bigger state than Texas." In most sections of the West the many problems of how to harvest, grow and protect trees on land that stands on end keep foresters and boss loggers awake. And nowadays tree-killing bugs are swarming up the ridges and over the pinnacles in hellish hordes.

On such questions foresters of all branches have learned to get together with a right good will. Last year the annual meeting was made into an international bivouac at Montreal, with the Canadian Institute of Forestry sharing the sessions. This year the forester from Pico Park, Vermont, will shoot the breeze on Pike's Peak, Colorado, and the lowland forester from Okeechobee, Florida, will breathe hard in the rarefied air of the Garden of the Gods where a "Chuckwagon Dinner" is in the cards. Many field trips up the canyons and over slide rock and down timber are in store. The Englemann spruce beetle will be studied in his lair. Big doings!

Men of the Hour

The latest report to come to my mailbox gives a figure of 13,600 for the technically-trained foresters now at work in the United States. There are 5,600 employed by industry and other private sources, 4,700 in the hire of Uncle Sam, 1,900 in education and research, and 1,400 with state, county and municipal forestry agencies. By far the greater number of these able and earnest men are members of the Society of American Foresters.

Perhaps the most important event scheduled for Colorado Springs is a joint session of the Division of Private Forestry and
