Inquire Before Retiring Suggested For Social Security by Field Man

"Millions of workers make social security contributions every pay-day, but relatively few of them take the time to inquire about their rights until after they have retired," Ev. Cummins, field representative of the Portland social security office, said this week. He suggests that all people covered by the system protect themselves and their families by inquiring before retiring.

"Before retiring at age 65 or later, each worker should have a full understanding of the requirements for becoming insured in the system," he continued. "He should know the best time to file his application and the method which will be used in figuring his monthly payments." Cummins pointed out that the matter of benefits which may be payable to the worker's wife and unmarried children under 18 years of age, in case of the breadwinner's death, is of prime importance to every family head.

"The employed woman who is furnishing at least one-half of her husband's support should be aware of her rights to benefit from her social security after she retires. A married woman working in a covered job should know about her children's rights to payments in the event of her death," he added.

"It is quite essential," Cummins said, "that the holder of every social security card tell the members of his family what their rights to benefits may be if death comes to him at any age. They should be told where the social security card is kept and that in the event of death it should be taken to the nearest social security office as soon as possible, and an inquiry made as to whom is eligible for benefits."

"All prospective beneficiaries of social security should know that payments are not made automatically at the time of retirement or death, but that an application must first be made.

Promptness in filing the application was emphasized by Cummins, since monthly payments cannot be made retroactively for more than six months. "The lump-sum death payment must be applied for within two years after a worker dies," he said.

Cummins makes regular visits to this area to assist applicants to fill out their applications for old-age and survivors insurance benefits and to furnish information about social security.
