AROUND THE FARM

BY DON COIN WALROD
County Extension Agent

The adult or moth form of the tent caterpillar has not made its appearance in any great numbers during the latter part of the summer, although the heavy tent caterpillar infestation over most of the area last spring would normally have led us to believe our evening lights would have them swarming about.

During the last stages of the caterpillar development considerable egg-laying of one of the caterpillar parasites, the Ichneuman fly, was observed. In checking a trial on the effectiveness of malathion for caterpillar control at Elmer Loyd's, Deer Island, it was found that nearly every caterpillar was carrying the attached egg of the parasite. These eggs showed up as small whitish spots, most of them being attached to, or close to, the head of the caterpillar.

The general absence of the moth and their nefarious egg laying should mean that we will have a considerable reduction in the numbers of the caterpillars next year.

Thinking of moths circling around lights or being attracted to them reminds us of a recent bit of information that can make life around the home a little more pleasant. Recently researchers have found that insects have a degree of color blindness, but are attracted by blue light.

By using yellow bulbs in fixtures such as porch lights and other exposed places, the insects are not attracted to the light because here is no blue light present.

Fall seeding time is nearly upon us. Many of the fields to be seeded will be in need of lime, phosphorus, or potash, and soil tests will be needed to determine just how much of these materials is required. Time for the running of these samples is growing short if the job is done before seeding time. To obtain maximum benefits most of the soil treatments need to be made prior to the time of seeding.

Since the complete procedure of testing and handling of soil samples requires three to four weeks from the time that they are sent in, farmers will need to get their samples in the mail soon if the results are to be back in time to be of use this fall.

Special cartons for samples of soil, along with instruction and an information form, can be obtained from county extension offices.

"Salt" treated Douglas fir posts served a useful life of three and one-half years in the raspberry patch of Thurman Jeffries, Yankton, before they were taken out of the ground when the patch was removed. Most of those posts still have considerable life left in them, but they show some things about this method of treating that is worth considering. Many of the posts are treated only on one side—that is, the hole for the salt material was bored on only one side of the post. Sometimes two holes were used on the larger posts.

Through experimental work at Oregon State College, and observations of such instances as this one at Jeffries', it has been found that the treating material moves vertically up and down the post and that there is very little horizontal movement around the post.

The cost of materials for using the salt method of treating and cold soaking with pentachlorophenol, "penta" for short, is about the same. Since only additional labor and time are involved in using the penta treatment, and the treatment is much more effective, Jeffries indicated that he felt that it would be worthwhile to plan and manage his farm post treating program in such a way that he could use penta. Posts will then have a useful life of 15 to 20 years.

New Rule on Razor Clams

New regulations on razor clam digging, both personal use and commercial, set at the July meeting of the Oregon fish commission in Portland will be in effect September 1, 1954, according to the Oregon fish commission, as follows.

1. Legal use of razor clams as crab bait has been extended along the entire Oregon coast. (Existing regulations limit use to Clatsop county only.)

2. The minimum length limit, on commercially dug razor clams only, has been increased from 3½ to 4½ inches. There is no minimum length limit on razor clams taken for personal use.

3. The bag limit on razor clams dug for personal use has been reduced from 36 to 24. Sport diggers must keep the first 24 clams they dig.

Explanations of why these changes were made are as follows:

"Razor clams grow most rapidly in their first two years of life. The larvae "set" on the beaches and begin to grow in early fall. By the next August large numbers of the clams are just over 3½ inches in length but not over 4¼ inches long. Most razor clams don't attain a 4¼ length until the following June, however in that second year the clams double in weight. Under the old 3½ inch minimum length limit on commercially dug clams, too many were being taken before they grew up.

The sport limit has been reduced to 24 because sport digging pressure is heavy and must also be restricted if the clams are to be protected until they reach their maximum weight. On the other hand, personal use diggers should be taking home a greater total weight of clams than they are now under the 36 clam limit because large clams will be more available after the regulations have been in effect for a year.

The use of razor clams for crab bait has been legalized coastwise in Oregon because the old regulation was discriminatory. That alone was not the reason for the change though. Oregon razor clams are less available to diggers in the winter months than they are during the summer. As a result, the fresh market absorbs practically all razor clams dug during the crab season. Commercial crabbers can't afford to outbid the fresh market price. They can afford to buy frozen clams imported from Washington, British Columbia, and Alaska though and that is where most of the clams used for crab bait come from. Some smaller, badly broken clams are used as crab bait, but this practice shall be rtstricted automatically by the higher minimum length limit."

Hoy concluded by saying that the new regulations are being adopted on the basis that a greater poundage production of razor clams on Oregon beaches can be achieved by protecting the clams until they reach their maximum size and that this is impossible without complete cooperation of all clam diggers.

Permits Available for Tenmile Lake Elk Hunt

Applications are now available for permits to hunt in the controlled Tenmile lake elk hunt in Coos county.

One hundred free permits will be issued to take one elk of either sex. This hunt is being held to harvest some of the elk in the area that are causing serious crop damage problems.

All persons applying for a permit must use the official blank furnished by the game commission and must fill out the application in entirety. Not more than four persons may apply to hunt together in one party.

All applications must be in the Portland office of the game commission before 10 a.m., August 31 to be eligible. The public drawing will be held on September 2 at 10 a.m., and all persons interested are invited to attend.

The drawing will be at the game commission headquarters at Southwest 17th and Alder streets in Portland.

Commission Offices Only Issue Archery Permits

Archery hunters of the state will have to obtain their free permits at one of the game commission offices this year instead of at the widely scattered distributors of last year.

The problem of distributing permits to all of the license agencies of the state is great since more than 25,000 must be printed to insure equal allotments. This means that in order for less than 5,000 archers to receive permits, five times that many must be sent out. Since these are free permits, there is no source of income to defray the expense of such a large operation.

Permits will be issued at the offices of the commission at Portland, Roseburg, Bend, La Grande, Hines, and the E. E. Wilson area near Corvallis. Also permits will be supplied by mail from these offices, providing the archer sends in his name and address when applying.

All archers are required by law to have one of the permits in possession when hunting in an archery area and to send in the attached report card at the end of the year.
