Post Treatment Lengthens Life

If Columbia county is an average county, we use about 125,000 new fence posts annually. This is only a small fraction of the amount used statewide, which amounts to about 4 1/2 million posts annually. Half of this number, or more than 60,000 posts in Columbia county, would be split cedar posts. A question that frequently comes up is, "Is there any advantage in using a cold-soak preservative treatment on split cedar posts?" Two ten-year-old trials started by a couple of farmers in Clackamas county probably gives the best information now available on this. These two farmers, Walter Fisher and Charles Marshall, probably started the first cold-soak trials on cedar in Oregon. Upon being checked after ten years of service, it was found that none of the posts checked showed any decay. Charles Ross, extension farm forestry specialist at Oregon State college, found that untreated cedar posts in that area last only about 10 to 12 years. Both of those Clackamas county farmers now use the cold-soak treatment as standard procedure when putting in fences. One more word on cedar fence posts. Farmers generally prefer posts with dark colored heartwood. To determine if dark posts are more durable than light-colored ones, the OSC Experimental Post Farm established two rows of split posts in 1923. One row had dark-colored heartwood, the other light colored. After 20 years the test revealed no difference in the two types as far as durability is concerned.
