Accidents Rise During Vacation

By Dr. Harold M. Erickson
Oregon State Health Officer
Statistics just completed show 1,120 persons lost their lives in Oregon accidents last year, slightly more than the 1,108 deaths during 1957.

Motor vehicle fatalities decreased from 494 to 467 and the deaths from home accidents continued to decline, dropping from 232 to 207. The two categories which pushed the total upward were occupational accidents, which increased slightly from 132 to 142, and public accidents, which rose sharply from 210 to 274.

More complete analysis of these figures reveals that five public and occupational sub-categories were responsible for Oregon's relatively-poor accident record last year. These were agriculture, manufacturing, water transportation, drownings, and miscellaneous public accidents, each of which showed substantial increases over 1957. It is interesting that logging, long known for its hazards, produced fewer fatalities last year, which speaks for the accident prevention work in this field.

We are now entering our vacation season, when thousands each week will take advantage of Oregon's plentiful supply of public beaches and waterways. Such recreation certainly contributes to good health, if we keep alert to the dangers involved. Last year 136 persons died from drowning or water transportation accidents. A good dose of common sense and a healthy respect for water by all vacationers would go a long way to reducing that toll this year.
