State To Change Highway Lines

The yellow center line so familiar to Oregon highway users will soon disappear as state highway traffic crews get their 1960 painting season underway, according to an announcement made here recently by W. C. Williams, state highway engineer.

The dashed center line, dashed lane lines, and solid edge strips will be painted white this year conforming to the national standards set by the U.S. Bureau of Public Roads. All other markings, though, will remain yellow, Williams said.

Yellow will be used for double center lines, curb markings, no passing zone barrier strips, stop lines, crosswalk lines, pavement word and symbol markings, joggle bars, lines along joggle bars, the face and top of curbed and raised islands and painted channelizing islands. It is expected that cities and counties in Oregon will adopt these standards either during 1960 or no later than 1961.
