Sheeley Seeks Hazard Removal

Lester Sheeley received a letter last week from A. E. Johnson, division engineer for the Oregon state highway department regarding findings on matters he and Mr. Sheeley had discussed when Johnson was in Vernonia June 22.

Sheeley had brought to the attention of Johnson what he felt constituted hazardous reverse curves at the junction of the Scofield road and at the southerly end of the bridge approximately one mile south of Vernonia.

Johnson's reply stated that during the past several years, the maintenance crews had improved sight distance at the Scofield road by cutting back banks to the limits of the existing right-of-way and improved the curve by additional paving. He further stated that since his conversation with Sheeley, he had ordered installation of additional sight posts at that point.

With regard to the bridge, Johnson stated that it was so constructed in 1959 to fit into future line changes if and when funds are available.

He further assured Sheeley that the rough crossing at the railroad spur in Vernonia would be remedied soon and that further study would be made of the other points.

He also called attention to the fact that during the past several years the highway department has concentrated on an over all improvement on the Nehalem highway and has expended considerable amounts of money on three overlay paving projects as well as minor improvements.
