EARLIEST ANCESTORS OF NORTHWEST COUNTIES

Each of you who reads this column and lives in the present states, of Oregon, Washington or Idaho is a resident in what was once the gigantic geographical area known as the "Oregon Country." But there was more to it than that. The vast territory stretched all the way from the 42nd parallel in the south (present boundary between Oregon and California-Nevada) to the southern boundary of the Russian settlements of that day: 54-40 degrees north. This would be between present-day Prince Rupert, B.C., and Ketchikan, Alaska. The Oregon Country was bounded on the west by the Pacific ocean and on the east by the Rockies. So it is that whether you readers are in Bellingham, in the northern reaches of Washington; or in Empire, down on the Oregon coast; or in Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia; or in Lewiston, where the Snake and Clearwater rivers flow together as they sweep out of the northern Idaho mountains—in all these places and in many more, you are in what was known as the "Oregon Country." In fact, this is the geographical and historical unity that binds all our PAGES FROM OUR PAST stories together.

It is of interest to note the very first attempt to divide the Oregon Country into political units. It happened as a result of the forming of the Provisional government in 1843 at Champoe, just across the Willamette river and downstream from Newberg, Oregon. When the embryonic government was formed, it was decided to divide the great territory into four districts: Twality, Clackamas, Yamhill and Champoeick. All of these were Indian names and subject to variations in spelling, the above being the actual spelling used in the documents of the Provisional government.

Why don't you get out a map of North America, or—if you have it—one of just our Pacific Northwest including British Columbia? We'll try to delineate for you the boundaries of these ancestors of our northwest counties one by one: TWALITY DISTRICT was described thus: "First district, to be called Twality district, comprising all the country south of the northern boundary line of the United States, west to the Willamette, or Multnomah, River, north of the Yamhill River, and east of the Pacific Ocean." "Approved by the people July 5, 1843." So extend a line directly north of where the Willamette joins the Columbia through Washington and B.C. all the way to 54-40: that would be the eastern boundary. The district included most of the Olympic peninsula, all of Vancouver island, and a huge hunk of British Columbia.

YAMHILL DISTRICT embraced "all the country west of the Willamette, or Multnomah, River and a supposed line running north and south from said river, south of the Yamhill river to the parallel of 42 degrees north latitude, or the boundary line of the United States and California, and east of the Pacific Ocean." This was the baby of the four districts.

CHAMPOOICK DISTRICT, the largest of all, covered the entire Oregon Country west of Twality district and south to an imaginary line drawn from the juncture of the Pudding River, near present-day Canby just east of the Portland-Salem freeway, all the way to the summit of the Rocky mountains: a large portion of British Columbia, most of the state of Washington, northeastern Oregon and Idaho as far south as New Meadows.

CLACKAMAS DISTRICT was described as "comprehending all the territory not included in the other three districts," in other words, southeastern Oregon and southern Idaho.

These districts later became the ancestral counties of our Pacific Northwest.
