QUESTION: I intend to apply for my social security benefits, but I will continue to do some work. I plan to restrict my earnings to $1200 a year. What do I include in counting this $1200?

ANSWER: If you are working for wages or a salary, count your gross wages or salary, not just your take home pay. Also count wages paid in a form other than cash, such as meals and living quarters. (However, if you work as a domestic in a private household or work on a farm, count only your cash wages.) Count earnings from all types of work whether or not they are covered by social security. Count bonuses, commissions, fees, and vacation and holiday payments. Do not count any dividends, interest on a savings account, payments from insurance policies, or pensions. These are not earnings from work.

QUESTION: I was involved in an accident at work and I have been bedridden over a year. The insurance company has been making monthly payments to me and my family, but these will run out in a few more months. I have been saving my social security for when they stop, as we will then have nothing but a small income from a house rental we have. I have heard you should file three months ahead to get social security. Should I file now?

ANSWER: Don't "save" social security for later. You may lose some possible benefits. If it appears you may be disabled indefinitely, social security payments could be made to you and your family starting several months ago. There is a six-month waiting period after becoming disabled, and payments can start only with the seventh month, but it appears that in your case this was some months ago. Contact your local Social Security office. If you cannot leave your home, a representative will call to see you.

QUESTION: I operate a business in which I occasionally hire workers for very short periods of employment. In many instances, I have been unable to secure their social security numbers and, subsequently, have received requests for the numbers from the central accounting office of the Social Security Administration. Sometimes, I am unable to comply with this request for information. What can I do to remedy this situation?

ANSWER: First of all, the law requires that the employer secure the employee's account number, and that the worker show his card to the employer. If the employer is unable to secure the account number in order to accurately complete his quarterly report, he should put the employee's last known address in the space provided for the account number. Our central accounting office will then attempt to contact the employee by mail for the necessary information.

An optimist lives on the theory that the less he has, the more there is to get.

Please advise us of your new address if you are planning to move.

AROUND THE FARM

By DON COIN WALROD
County Extension Agent

A number of Oregon's counties rank at the top in the nation in production of certain crops, according to information from a census publication, "Ranking Agricultural Counties," provided by Mrs. Elvera Horrell, OSU agricultural economist.

Umatilla is tops in the nation in green peas, fifth in wheat, and sixth in vegetables. Marion county is top county in the acres of strawberries harvested and third in quantity sold. Other counties ranking in the top ten are Jackson fifth in pears; Washington, fourth in strawberries; Hood River, fourth in both acreage and production of pears; Malheur, fifth in dry onions, eighth in sugar beet acreage, and tenth in beets harvested; Clackamas, sixth in strawberries and seventh in turkey breeding hens.

Mrs. Horrell indicates that Oregon counties would be mentioned more often in the report if so-called "specialty" crops were listed. For instance, the report does not include canberries, filberts, and many seeds, some of which are grown almost exclusively in Oregon.

Columbia county would rank number one in the nation in the production of Astoria bentgrass, since this high-quality turf grass is produced mostly in this county and Clatsop county.

Debris removal and repair or restoration of buildings, orchards and other facilities has moved at a rapid pace since the October 12 storm, but much of the work done has been of an emergency nature.

More permanent repairs will need to follow at appropriate times and under the proper circumstances. In some cases the damage is such that restoration cannot be made. Because of the costliness of repairing certain types of damage, many requests have been made about information on disaster aid.

In addition to insurance that individuals may hold on buildings, livestock, and some other kinds of property, some other forms of assistance are available now or may become so in the near future. For instance, disaster loans may be available through the farm home administration. However, FHA people point out that these loans may be used only for restoration on farms that have an economical potential of repaying the loan. They indicate that their regular loan program may be of greater benefit to the borrower in that he can then make needed changes in his operation and that the repayment period is for a longer period of time.

Debris in and adjacent to most of Western Oregon's streams poses a threat to bridges, farmland and other property when and if high water causes jams and blockages to result. Federal funds are available for the clearance of such debris through state civil service director. These funds are available to legal bodies of government such as municipalities, counties, drainage, fire and soil conservation districts.

Funds for debris removal from streams may become available on a cost-sharing basis through the agricultural stabilization and conservation service. This agency may also be able to supply some assistance in removing debris from orchards and in restoring damaged orchards. However, the details concerning this program are not complete at this time and probably will not be for at least 10 to 15 days. Cost sharing in this case will be provided on the basis of 80 percent of the cost of the practices, but with maximum limits.

Some assistance, such as that available through FHA and ASCS, will operate on a retroactive basis, taking care of damage from the storm point on. From the standpoint of these agencies, as well as from income tax, insurance, and other reasons, particular attention should be given to records of costs of all work done in repairing and restoring property damaged in the storm. Generally, it will be necessary to substantiate such costs and work done to claim assistance or make deductions.

One of the most successful special statewide services offered by Oregon State University is that of the soils testing laboratory established in 1953 to analyze soil samples. Extension agents are then able to recommend needed fertilizer programs for specific crops. The first full year the laboratory was in operation Oregon farmers sent in 1450 soil samples; last year's total was about 7,000.

A big impetus to the soils testing program has been a "Testing Tells" program. Research workers were so interested in results from one such test last summer on the Hudson-Rowell Farm, Scappoose, that an expanded program was established last week in a grass and clover field.

Soil scientist Dr. Tom Jackson and Grant Braun of the American Potash Institute assisted in laying out and fertilizing 14 plots which were replicated three times. Spring versus fall fertilization at varying rates will be compared. Yields will be measured on the plots next spring.
