Maintenance Prevents Fire

Many fires are started from motors and from miscellaneous use of flames around the house or farm, points out County Agent Tom Zinn.

Implements that use power, but don't produce it, such as saws, sanders, and grinders, can produce friction, static electricity, or sparks. Power driven machines should be carefully greased and oiled to prevent friction. This applies to small motors on washing machines and refrigerators.

Give some thought to the refrigerator during long warm spells when it is running overtime and may be heating. It is good practice to clean any dust and other flammable materials away from these motors says Zinn.

All tractors and combines should be equipped with spark arrestors and fire extinguishers. All trucks entering grain fields should be equipped with exhaust pipes coming directly up from the motor with spark arrestors attached and the arrestors should be checked frequently.

All electrical wiring of vehicles used in grain fields should be checked before harvest starts to make sure no shorting will occur by wire coming in contact with the metal frame. Such sparks have started many fires as a result of this.

A combine should not be left unattended during the noon hours as this is the most dangerous hour of the harvest day stresses Zinn. Many grain and field fires start during the noon hour from the combine and hot boxes. When working with machinery operating with gasoline motors a disc plow or double disc should be kept handy to hitch onto in case of fire.

Zinn says that every precaution should be used to prevent sparks when working around gasoline and, of course, gasoline should never be exposed if it can be avoided. It is wise to let your equipment cool down before you add gasoline. Cigarette smoking becomes extremely hazardous when machinery is being refueled: If you smoke, take five and have that cigarette before you attempt to refuel your equipment.

Don't use gasoline for cleaning machinery and don't use it as a dry cleaning fluid. Static sparks are easily created and it only takes one such spark to explode the gas vapors. Working outside does not afford any more protection when using gasoline as a cleaning fluid than inside of a building.

On farm safety pays as much as operating a vehicle on the freeway. A large percentage of our farm accidents and fatalities could be avoided if people would practice safety precautions rather than just reading them states Zinn. Farm accidents are costly, just remember the life you save may be your own.

Feuds are started by people who want peace at their price.
