IT'S YOUR LAW

Respect for Law Makes Democracy Live

WHAT IS INCOME

In preparing your tax return the first item you must determine is your gross income. Unless you are engaged in a business or have income from property this figure will normally be made of cash received from your employer. However, some cash receipts are excluded and you may have income even though you receive no cash. Normally the fair market value of things you receive as compensation must be included in income. If your employer provides you with a house in which to live its rental value is income to you. So too if he pays for your meals. The only exception to this rule about meals and lodging is that if they are furnished to you on your employer's premises for his convenience they are not income. For example, if it is essential to your employer that you be on his property 24 hours a day and he furnished you a house on the property its rental value is not income to you. If, on the other hand, he pays your rent as an inducement to get you to move to a new location, the rent he pays is income to you.

Although usually the fair market value is the amount to be included in income as the result of the receipt of property from your employer, if you have agreed to work for a specified amount and he pays you with property rather than cash, the amount you have agreed upon will normally be the amount to include in income.
