Everyone who has tried to grow a crop, whether commercial, a garden, or just ornamentals around the home knows the problems of competition when the soil is infested with quackgrass. However, most folks don't realize that there is more involved than just the competition of the very vigorous rhizomes, although we have told the story frequently in recent years.

Learning how plants resist disease will be the goal of basic research at a new ARS Pioneering Research Laboratory on the nature of disease resistance in plants.

Scientists at this new laboratory, located on the campus of the University of Wisconsin at Madison, will seek an understanding of how disease organisms such as bacteria and fungi attack plants, and how some plants are able to resist infection.

Results of these studies are expected to aid plant breeders in speeding development of resistant varieties.

When fully staffed, the laboratory will have four senior scientists, a pathologist, two biochemists and one plant physiologist—plus several research and graduate assistants.

This staff will work closely with University plant pathologists. USDA has 23 other pioneering research laboratories to help meet the need for basic research in specific areas. The pioneering investigations, begun in 1957, are part of USDA's regular program of basic research, which includes studies to obtain new knowledge needed to solve recognized agricultural problems.
