Flood Caused Heavy Losses In Northwest

The harsh, swirling waters that accompanied an eight-day torrential rampage through the Pacific Northwest in January now have been pinned with a statement of charges.

The rains, together with a rapid snowmelt and run-off, racked up more than $110 million in property damages, caused 16 fatalities and inundated hundreds of square miles of real estate.

Federal Disaster Assistance Administration Regional Director William H. Mayer in Seattle today disclosed that over $62 million in federal relief, much of it in the form of grants and loans, will be provided in Washington, Idaho and Oregon to help repair the damage and assist flood-stricken families to recover from the effects of the disaster.

FDAA is the agency charged with coordinating and managing federal disaster recovery efforts, and administers the President's Disaster Fund in Presidentially-declared major disaster areas. The Fund is used to finance reconstruction of State and local public facilities, debris clearance, and to provide temporary housing, disaster unemployment assistance and other emergency help in disaster-torn areas.

In all, Mayer said that more than 3,400 families suffered losses in the January flooding over the three-state area. He said that 3,016 dwellings and mobile homes and 126 farm buildings were damaged or destroyed, and that over 100 businesses were seriously disrupted.

A total of 29 counties in Washington, Idaho and Oregon have been designated for federal disaster aid with recovery work well under way.

A large segment of federal recovery funds have been earmarked for the private sector, with over $23.5 million in Small Business Administration and Farmers Home Administration emergency loans projected to help restore homes, businesses and agricultural operations, and a potential of over $2.2 million in USDA cost-sharing programs for farmers and ranchers.
