The Red Shawl.

There lives in Atchison a woman who has been happily married 40 years and who has raised five children. Recently she was out walking when she caught sight of a peculiarly bright red shawl. The men will sniff at what happened next: The woman felt twinge at her heart; the shawl had reminded her of a girl who had stolen her first lover. The girl always wore red of that shade. Then the old woman went home, took out her false teeth that she might not swallow them in her grief, and gave herself up to sad memories. We will bet no woman will sniff. An incident like this appeals to the women .- Atchison Globe.

lucky Victima. The floods in Paris afforded golden opportunities to the thieves and hooli-gans-the dreaded "Apaches"-of the French capital. A Paris correspondent sends an interesting account of these rockless men and their methods and weapons.

"The desperate criminals who make a specialty of night attacks are a bloodthirsty, cowardly set of ruffians, and as they are always armed to the teeth and hold human life cheap, a solitary citizen going home late, or a policeman on a lonely beat has very little chance against them.

"When they have once made up their minds to rob a passerby-which one does not matter much-it is more than likely they will decide to begin operations at once. That means that three Apaches will take up a position on the pavement and pretend to be engaged in innocent gossip. The street is deserted. A solitary pedestrian comes into sight. In a moment he is measured up by the three scoundrels on the lookout for their prey. There is not a policman in sight. The moment is favorable.

"'He has a gold chain,' says one. "'He'll do,' says the chief of the criminal trio. 'Get ready.'

"They continue to converse until the stranger reaches them. Involuntarily he glances at them as he passes. That is sufficient. "'What do you mean by looking at us like that?' asks the chief in an insolent tone. Then, turning to his companions, he remarks, 'Hasn't he got an ugly mug?'

"The pedestrian, however little he may be inclined to quarrel with the evil-looking ruffians who have accosted him, is unlikely to take their insults in silence. But at his first word of protest one of the group advances on him with a menacing air.

" 'What!' he exclaims, 'I'll show you who you've got to deal with.' "The stranger stands on his guard ut immediately another mer

Apple Sauce as Dessert.

Prepared in the German way, apple auce becomes a dinner dessert rather than as with us, a breakfast or luncheon relish.

Che would not care for the Teutonic version as a perpetual thing to the exclusion of our own excellent Yankee dish, but once in a while it is extremely tasty, especially when no other idea for the family dessert presents itself. After preparing the sauce as usual sprinkle with cinnamon, decorate with halves of blanched almonds and sarve with cream the trio bounds upon him from behind, seizes him around the neck with his arm and lifts him off the ground. His cries for help are stifled in his throat. and if he succeeds in making a sound the arm which presses against his throat is tightened and he loses con sciousness.

"While this is going on another of the accomplices goes through the victim's pockets, while the third keeps watch for the police. Then, when everything worth taking has been appropriated, the wretch who has almost strangled the victim releases his arm, gives him a violent push and sends him headlong to the pavement where he will lie senseless for half an hour at least.

"But things do not always pass so easily. Sometimes the victim shows more resistance than was expected, and then the Apaches have to modify their plans. He must either be stunned with a blow from a mutton-bone or given a stab with a knife or dagger The mutton-bone used by the Paris Apache is a terrible weapon. In ap pearance it resembles a small hatchet, without a handle, is about six inches long, and comes from the shoulder of the sheep. This and the knife and the knuckle-iron are the favorite weapons of the Paris hooligan. They are ef-fective and noiseless, whereas the use of the revolver is likely to attract the police. 11058 1 -1150

"Among the more recent methods invented by the Paris Apache for rendering the passing citizen incapable of resistance is the lasso. At the favorable moment a cord from 15 to 20 feet in length and ending in a running knot is thrown by an expert hand. As it falls over the victim's heal it is jerked light, and, half stran gled, he is thrown to the ground. The rest is easy."
