Serious Meat Shortage Not Now In Prospect

Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis.—"In my opinion we are not in any way facing a meat shortage," says E. L. Potter, professor of animal husbandry at O. A. C.

"We shall not have the abundance of cheap meats we had 15 years ago, but that is all right as they were too cheap and we were eating more than was good for us."

Prices are high, thinks professor Potter, because the livestock is consuming all available feeds, excessive, even considering the high price of livestock.

Not more livestock but better utilization of feed through better breeding, feeding and management, and production of more cheap feeds, especially grass, is Oregon's problem, according to Professor Potter. As long as feed is high meat animals will be high, when feed goes down stock price will drop.

The livestock industry of Oregon is in fine shape, both for the present and future. The extension problem of the college is to answer stockmen's questions on feeding, breeding, purchase and distribution of better stock, in doing which it adds materially to the interests of producer of livestock and consumer of meat.

A writer telling about the outing of the Authors' guild at Florida, Mo., Mark Twain's birthplace, says that the "jumping frog" story was a favorite anecdote among the stories told by Twain's humorous uncle, John A. Quarles, and that Quarles brought it along with him from the backwoods of Tennessee. Some pundit dug the same tale out of ancient Greek literature not many years ago. It is no doubt impossible, but it would be highly interesting to trace the lip-to-lip journey of the story back through the colonies and across the sea to the learned clerk in Oxford or Cambridge who first translated it from classic Greek to homely English and told it over his cake and ale. Maybe it was Ben Jonson and maybe Shakespeare passed it on.

Friendship.
There must be in friendship something to distinguish it from a companion and a countryman, from a school fellow or a gossip, from a sweetheart or a fellow traveler. Friendship may look in at any one of these doors, but it stays not anywhere till it comes to be the best thing in the world; and when we consider that one man is not better than another, neither toward God nor toward man, but by doing better and braver things we shall also see that which is most beneficent is also most excellent; and therefore those friendships must needs be most perfect where the friends can be most useful.—Jeremy Taylor.

A Woman's Beauty.
There was once a movie queen who had ears that stuck out like door-knobs. Likewise in a moment of anger a jealous husband bit a piece out of one of them. Did it leave her a broken-hearted wreck on the shoals of beauty? It did not. She forthwith did her hair up in a cute way that covered her ears completely from the critical gaze of the public. Now every woman in the world is wearing her hair the same way. The bovines and the hatchet faces are all in the same class. The girl whose greatest physical charm was her little, pink, shell-like ears now has them buried 'neath a whirligig of hair. The fashion makes most women ugly, but they are still in fashion. Women are said to be quite clever, but a lot of them never learn how to do up their own hair to advantage.—Los Angeles Times.

How Banana Grows.
What most people regard as the top of a bunch of bananas is the bottom. In the stores the bananas hang bottom side up, the way they grow. The bunches on each stalk are called hands, the hands grow alternately on the stalk, the hands that number odd numbers are on one side of the stalk and those that number even numbers of the opposite side, and on a full stalk the number of bananas to a hand can be definitely computed, as the number of bananas in a hand contains one less than the previous hand, this being invariably true. A section of a banana divides naturally into three pieces shaped like a piece of pie. Natives of banana-growing countries always scrape the mealy coating off the banana before eating it.

Neutrality That Counts.
Companionship, business co-operation and, home discipline and happiness depend upon neutrality that knows when to refrain, withhold, submit and even to submerge one's ideas and personality for the sake of letting otherwise drab, uninteresting people or subjects come out in the clear light.
But let us not permit our neutrality to make us so indifferent and inattentive to faults or errors of indiscretion that we cannot voice some protest helpful to delinquent warring factions, whether it be in the home or in the larger workaday world.
