

OREGON CORN BELT SEEN BY LEADERS

"A Crop for 200,000 Acres," is the way E. R. Jackman, extension crops specialist at Oregon State college, speaks of field corn. This description is now used as the title of a mimeographed booklet containing articles on corn growing in Oregon and published by the Loggers and Contractors Machinery company of Portland for free distribution.

This booklet, which contains no advertising, is made up of seven articles originally prepared by members of the Oregon State college staff for use over the radio, together with two other articles, one by a farmer telling his experiences in corn growing, and the other giving a brief history of corn growing in Oregon.

"Can Oregon grow corn in competition with the middle west?" asks Mr. Jackman. "The answer is no, but we do not need to. Washington and Oregon alone import 150,000 tons of corn from the middle west states, so the price here is always far above the corn belt price. It would take roughly 200,000 acres to make up this deficit in corn."

Jackman points out that a farmer can raise as many or more bushels of corn to the acre as wheat, far more pounds of corn than of oats and at less cost of production per hundred pounds. He also shows that Oregon needs corn badly as a cultivated crop.

VITAMIN - A I T A M I N D BUTTER—NATURE'S OWN FOOD Butterfat is unique among the food fats in that it contains, in addition to heat and energy, vitamin A, which promotes growth and health, and builds resistance to pulmonary infection, and vitamin D, which prevents rickets and promotes bone development—both indispensable to the growth and best health of the body. These vitamins are not present in other food fats in appreciable quantities. Butterfat is the most practical, economical and palatable year-round food source of these vitamins.
