Be Careful When Moving Hay Derrick

Hay derricks operated in those sections of the country where electric lines are strung have been contributing factors in a large number of serious accidents.

Many of the accidents were due to errors in judgment of the space or distance between the derrick-boom or mast and the wires; others to an unexpected sidewing of the boom when turning a corner or rounding a curve; still others to tilting of the boom.

Both the hay derrick and the electric line, each in its way, are necessary to the material welfare of the interested public, and in many sections of the country they must exist together. Either one can be eliminated, and both should be so operated as not to interfere with the purposes of either.

The principles of safe operation when moving a derrick in the vicinity of electric wires are simple:

Be sure the mast of the derrick is not too high to go under the electric wires and that there will be ample clearance.

Do not let the boom swing. First level the boom, then tie it down at both ends.

Do not hold or touch either the chain or cable and keep away from all metal parts.

Do not, under any circumstances, attempt to raise or move the electric wires.

Where there is any doubt of safety in moving near electric wires call the power company for assistance.

Tell the young folks not to fly their kites near electric lines, as serious injury can occur if the kite string makes contact with the wire.

Caution them not to climb poles, and to keep away from all electric lines, no matter where they are.

Do not attach radio aerial to electric poles nor run it near electric wires.
