AN OLD FACE RETURNS

Legalization of beer in Idaho has returned to frequent use a once common word which now is proving a sticker to many tongues unused to its sound. The word is "draught."

The poor thing has been called everything from its proper pronunciation—"draft" to "draw," "druff" and even "drouth."

It is the fault of the spelling. Webster seems to have guessed the word would some day be bothersome to clumsy tongues for he listed the simplified spelling, "draft," in preference to "draught."

Use of either is optional, of course, but signpainters who once piled busy brushes in the frequent lettering of the word seem not to have learned to spell it the simpler way and as a result there are more "draught" beer signs popping up these days than there are "draft" beer signs.

It is only natural the younger persons should wrestle with the word. Rusty from almost two decades of storage, the word is comparatively new to them. But to the old timers, it is like an old face—once known, always remembered. It was as common as "coffee" or "tea" in everyday talk of the pre-war days. Then they called it "draft."

So now we say "draft," any old way it's spelled.—Ex.
