EASTERN OREGON HELPED BY DROUTH SPRINGS AND WELLS

The cooperative project by the Drouth Relief service and the Oregon SERA to provide wells and improve springs in the drouth stricken eastern Oregon livestock country resulted in the improvement of 3000 springs and the establishment of 3000 wells, of direct benefit to 705 families in 10 eastern Oregon counties, according to a compilation just made by P. M. Bandt of Oregon State college, assistant drouth relief director for this state.

The permanent improvement of the water facilities over this vast area has been described as one of the best SERA projects yet attempted, and the efficient method by which it was carried out under the direction of Ivan Oakes, district engineer for the SERA, has attracted much attention, even outside of Oregon, according to reports received by Professor Brandt. As soon as money was received from the federal government last July, earmarked for this emergency work, crews of unemployed were put at the task without delay in counties which had been designated in whole or in part as drouth areas.

Close cooperation was maintained by the works division of SERA under Boston Palmer, the county work committees, and the college, while the federal forest service supplied tents and equipment for the workers through arrangements made by E. N. Kavanaugh, assistant regional forester. County agents were all on the job, says Oakes.

Springs and water holes improvements were practically all done in the national forests, while the new wells were located on the public domain or in stock driveways where the water is now available to all within useable distance of each. In some instances a single well serves a radius of 25 miles or more, Professor Brandt reports.

The project served to supply 104,000 work hours for the unemployed in the district, or enough to provide 13,000 eight-hours days of labor. The cost for materials and equipment amounted to approximately $53,000, while the increased value of these permanent improvements to the territory is estimated at more than $320,000. More than a million and a quarter acres of range land are affected by the improvements, serving a livestock population of more than 32,000 head of cattle and 575,000 head of sheep.

Grant, Crook and Harney counties received the largest number of improved springs, while Harney and Umatilla were the location of most of the new wells. The list of improvements in Malheur county include 6 springs, benefiting 31 families with the value at $18,450.

The total number of springs was 300, families 591, value $118,670. The total number of wells was 26, families served 114, value $202,500.
