Forecasting Not Exact Science

Forecasting never has and never will be an exact science, according to a weather bureau expert. That is because we must deal with air which cannot be tied down. The sun, lakes, mountains, and deserts are factors which affect air and determine weather conditions. The men who make the forecasts are those with years of training, which includes the making of practice forecasts for states and districts. These men are graded on this work and the most accurate—those who top the list—are given assignments as assistant observers. They move up on the death or retirement of the principal observers.
