Diary of A Fisherman

The Brief Story of The Events in The Day of An Ordinary Oregon Fisherman.

Up in silence at 1 a. m. Did set the water in boil on the electric stove after thirty minute silence on part of tea kettle did discover that juice was not turned on. After a valiant search for hiding place of coffee did gently approach the mistress of the house and with sweet words inquired as to the secret whereabouts of the household. On being told where to go—to find the coffee, did managed to stir up a breakfast of a sort.

On the sound of a horn under the window, did bath the last crumbs, remove the worms from the ice box and with tackle in full array did depart.

On reaching stream did enjoy several hours fishing with but minor injuries to him, flunk, ulna and occipital bones, sustained in falling over rocks. Did catch one small fish but lost same when forced to wade to an approach of game warden.

After listening to many tall stories of companions regarding the number of "A. H. some under ten pounds, that narrowly escaped, did tell my own tale and return to my home where a note saying "have returned to Mother" did await me. And so another holiday.
