Hypnotism

Hypnotism was probably used by priests of ancient cults to perform seeming miracles, but the state was not recognized by medical men until the middle of the Eighteenth century, when Franz Mesmer tried to cure patients by putting them into a hypnotic trance. The state is a form of dissociation whereby the brain is no longer able to control the body except at the suggestion of the hypnotist. It is induced by stroking or by gazing fixedly at an object at close range. Once experienced, it is entered into at the command of the hypnotizer. By a similar sharp command the subject is aroused and resumes the normal state.

Size of Some Skulls

The average man has about 1,450 cubic centimeters of brains and woman's capacity is 1,250 to 1,300. Daniel Webster's skull measured close to 2,000; Bismark's, 1,965; the poet La Fontaine's, 1,950; Beethoven's, 1,750, and Kant, the philosopher, 1,740. With one exception, these were the biggest heads ever measured and all fell short of the skull of an Aleut, who is thought to have lived several hundred years ago. The exception was the skull of the Russian writer Turgeniev, which had a capacity of 2,030 cubic centimeters, for No. 1 ranking.
