I'd Rather Be Cohan

By Daniel I. McNamara

Lorenz Hart and Richard Rodgers

WITH George M. Cohan as its star, and Richard Rodgers and Lorenz Hart, inseparables of popular song, as the creators of its musical numbers, the Sam H. Harris Broadway musical hit, "I'd Rather Be Right," is bringing new lustre to the brilliant records of three distinguished members of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers.

George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart, partners in many theatrical writings, prepared the book. Rodgers and Lorenz Hart, for eighteen years a partnership in creating songs, wrote the music and lyrics. And another famous partnership, Cohan and Harris, is recalled in the association of the former as star and the latter as producer of the current success.

While George M. Cohan's recent activities in the theatre have overshadowed his earlier efforts as a songwriter, the fact is that for more than forty years he has been a successful creator of songs. Back in 1895, songs with both words and music by George M. Cohan were sung in Tony Pastor's, Koster & Bial's, Hyde & Behman's and other music halls of the mauve decade.

Cohan the Songwriter
His "Hot Tamale Alley" was a favorite in 1895, when May Irwin scored one of the memorable hits of her career with this early coon song by the man who was to write more than twenty years later the immortal battle hymn of the doughboy, "Over There."

George M. Cohan's membership in ASCAP is more than a perfunctory matter. None knows better than he the injustices suffered by the creators of song, and for his fellow creators of song he cherishes a devoted spirit. He has never taken office in the Society, but is one of its most vigorous protagonists. His historic appearances in the halls of legislation at Washington to help the Society's fight against the impairment of copyright law is one of the bright pages of the Society's records.

Rodgers and Hart are celebrating in this new show an event of signal importance in their joint career—the creation of their one thousandth song. Even they have lost track of the actual count, but they're sure that somewhere in the program of "I'd Rather Be Right" their total reached the one thousand mark.

A Long Collaboration
They have been writing songs together from the time eighteen years ago when Rodgers, an undergraduate composer at Columbia, called back Hart, who had preceded him through the college, to write the lyrics for the Varsity Show. Within a few months they had produced the songs for a Broadway show, "The Four Little Ritz Girls." In eighteen years of successes, Rodgers has composed for no one but Hart, and Hart has written for no other composer.

Of all their songs, their favorite is "With a Song in My Heart," but the most frequently played is "My Heart Stood Still." In "I'd Rather Be Right" the songs are full of hilarious joshing for the New Dealers, and in both song and book, George M. Cohan finds rich material for his astonishing impersonation of The President.
