

Angina Pectoris

By

WHEN there is a "griping" pain in the region of the heart which may go up the left side of the chest and sometimes down the left arm, it is only natural that this pain would be considered angina pectoris or breast pang. If the other symptoms—stopping still and supporting the body with the hand and the other hand held over the heart—are present it would be definitely called angina pectoris.

Another point about true angina pectoris is that it always comes on during effort—work or exercise. When the pain comes on at other times—when the individual is at rest or lying down—it is not considered to be a true but a false angina.

Dr. J. E. F. Riseman and M. G. Brown, Boston, in the American Heart Journal, recorded their investigation of 207 patients suspected of having angina pectoris. All the usual methods of testing were used; that is, the history of the symptoms, X-ray, tracing the outline of the heart, the heart rate, the metabolism (rate at which body processes work), effect of exercise or work.

Five Chief Symptoms.
These physicians state the five important characteristics or symptoms of angina pectoris:

1. The attacks were sudden in onset.
2. The attacks lasted but a short time, usually just a few seconds.
3. The pain was located in the front of the chest and inner side of the arm.
4. The attacks were brought on by exertion in the cold.
5. The attacks consisted of a vague, indescribable sensation of unrest or distress.

"Patients who lacked one or more of these five characteristics or symptoms proved to have either no heart disorder as the cause of their symptoms or to have not only angina pectoris but some other complicating ailment."

When there was difficulty in deciding definitely as to whether the case was true angina pectoris, the effect of exercise—running upstairs, walking briskly, hopping or running on the one spot—usually decided the matter, as true angina pectoris occurs during exercise or effort.

Thus when you feel any pain over the heart or under the breast bone do not become alarmed and think you have angina pectoris, as most pains in this region are due to pressure of gas in the stomach or intestine.

Removal of Teeth.

A champion amateur and later professional boxer consulted his physician regarding a pain in his lower back. He stated that the pain got easier or even passed away when he was exercising, but was so bad at night that he couldn't get much sleep. He felt "tired" all the time.

As the physician could find no other trouble present—tonsils, gall bladder, sinuses—and X-ray showed some infection at roots of two teeth, the boxer referred to his dentist. The dentist admitted that there was a little trouble present, but not enough to justify the removal of such otherwise good teeth in a young man of twenty-one.

The young man then consulted another dentist, equipped with his own X-ray apparatus, who, after examining these new films, declared that the two teeth should be removed at once. Both teeth were removed and found to be infected, the odor from one being particularly disagreeable. The pain in the lower back disappeared within two or three days, and the young man resumed training in less than a week and a few weeks afterward won the boxing championship.

It is in such cases as the above that the physician and the dentist are placed in an awkward position. The dentist could readily extract the tooth or teeth and insert some bridge work but he knows that nothing can do the work as well as the patient's own teeth and he tries to save them. Perhaps he feels that there may be some other source of infection that is causing the symptoms and if teeth are not removed this source may be found.

On the other hand, the physician feels that as he has checked all other possible sources, the teeth must be to blame, and that the infection present may be due to very dangerous organisms which may sooner or later cause serious complications and possibly death.

FLASHES FROM PARIS

Hair is brushed high in curls. Interest in stripes runs at high tempo.

Boa-like necklaces of flowers are worn. White with black carries wide style appeal.

Monotone bodices with printed skirt is new formula.

New dresses are styled with long sweater-top waists.

Bird-motif jewelry also bird trims on hats are featured.

Lily of the Valley Now Is Favorite of Fashion

Hats trimmed with flowers that are matched with boutonniere or corsage of the same flower are the rage. While every flower is in fashion, enthusiasm for the lovely fresh looking dainty lily of the valley knows no bounds. You can find entire turbans made of the exquisite posy or your milliner will take keen delight in posing a cluster at the front of your new straw pill-box hat. If it is a wide brim model you are wearing give it charm and "class" with a monture of lilies of the valley positioned high at the front crown. Of course you must wear lilies to match on the lapel of your tailleur or a corsage of these charming wee white blossoms with your new print or black sheer frock.
