OREGON BACK IN THE FOLD

SALEM—That the results of the recent general election in this state contained many surprises goes without saying. The landslide which swept Charles A. Sprague into the governorship, for instance, was hardly expected by even his most optimistic supporters. Conservative estimates of Sprague's majority prior to the election, among those who predicted success for the Republican candidate, ranged from 15,000 to 25,000. Those who dealt in larger margins were the rare exception. The same was true in the case of Rufus C. Holman's victory in the senatorial race. Most prognosticators predicted that the race between Holman and Willis Mahoney would be close and that Holman's margin would be a slim one, should he succeed in winning at all.

Among all of the alibis and explanations that have been advanced to account for the sweeping Republican victory in this state stand out as most logical. In the first place it was a return to normalcy, Oregon being normally a Republican state that was only swept into the Democratic column by the Roosevelt landslide of 1932 and retained therein by the popularity of New Deal policies in the elections of 1934 and 1936. This return to normalcy was speeded by dissension in the ranks of the Democratic party which was hopelessly split into a left-wing or radical group led by Elton Watkins, Henry L. Hess and others and a conservative group commonly referred to as Martin Democrats. Many of these latter unquestionably supported the Republican nominees in retaliation for the defeat administered their candidate by Hess in the May primaries.

That Rex Putnam, state superintendent of public instruction, a Democrat, survived the rout of his partisans in this state speaks volumes for the calibre of this official who had the active support not only of the educators throughout the state but of a large majority of the newspapers as well.

MARTIN GETS IN THE LAST WORD

When Governor Martin retired to his political tent following his defeat in the May primaries it was with a promise to his advisers that he would take no part in the general election campaign. That promise was rightly adhered to. But on Wednesday morning, following the general election, he came out of his political retirement beaming with satisfaction over the results of the election, with the laconic comment that "Oregon still flies with her own wings." That remark can be interpreted in only one way. It was a public notice to Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes and other members of the national administration that throughout the general election campaign Hess as well as Willis Mahoney, democratic candidate for the United States senate, repeatedly resorted to the warning that unless they were elected the national administration could not be expected to look with favor on Oregon' future requests for PWA and WPA grants and other similar favors.

TOURIST SLUMP
A big reduction in the number of non-resident motorists registering in Oregon this year is accounted for by Secretary of State Snell as due to the slump in "immigration" from the dust bowl of the middle west.

INSTITUTIONS IN GOOD FINANCIAL CONDITION
All of the state institutions will pull through the biennium without a deficit according to Wallace S. Wharton, budget director. Several of the institutions will be able to return sizeable unexpended balances to the general fund, Wharton said.
