Luxurious Tailored Suits Radiant With Fall Colors

By CHERIE NICHOLAS

SEEING the luxurious three-piece suits or costume suits, as the case may be, fashioned as they are of glamorous woolsens that are radiant with rich autumnal colorings.

this season's suits is the fact that they are softly tailored with subtle feminine touches that have in them no suggestion of stereotyped severe "lines." There are many intriguing trimming touches such as bindings of stitched velvet finishing edges of gay plaids or leather.

Paris realizes what is meant when it says "more color everywhere for fall and winter."

The newer woolsens are superbly colorful, so much so one recognizes in them a direct challenge to the supremacy of black which for so long a time has held sway. The colors featured this season are so glorious within themselves and the combinations that designers create are so daring and unusual, inspired as they are by the richness of the purples, the dregs of wine, tawny browns, deep greens and luminous jewel shades of the teal blue that is so vastly important just now, it is no wonder that "Paris has gone color-mad" as has been said in regard to recent couturier displays.

The color glory that dramatizes the current fashion picture so thrillingly this season is especially noticeable in the new wool weaves that are being fashioned into stunning coats and suits. In consequence suits and ensembles tailored of genuinely elegant woolsens form the basis for every wisely appointed wardrobe in the opinion of those who guide our fashion destinies.

This demand for high quality does not imply extravagance. As a matter of fact the very opposite is true for having acquired through painstaking regard as to fine fineness in every detail a costume that speaks related color and motif a guarantee has been underwritten which carries the assurance of being well dressed for the majority of occasions.

Perhaps the most important thought to keep in mind concerning

Consider the very charming three piece suit to the left in the picture. Here is a glowing example of the effective use designers are making of color. Plum-colored imported tweed having a light blue crossbar is employed for the making of this smart three-piece. The skirt and the piping on the short jacket are of the plum tweed in monotone. The hat is of matching plum suede with stitched brim. Here is a grand chance to wear light blue accessories and a blouse in blue would offer a pleasing change.

To the right, tweed in a mixture of reddish brown and dark blue is used for the whole outfit. A beaver collar is on the jacket. Hat, bag, gloves and shoes are in reddish brown. This is a three-piece that tunes to weather changes perfectly because of the protective cape that may be worn or not at will.

Speaking of capes, considerable emphasis is being placed on cloth evening wraps and the circular cape of fine broadcloth that extends midway between waist and knees (an inspiration of the nineties) is a favorite. Quaint looking indeed but tres chic just the same.

Interest in smooth face velvety surfaced woolsens is being revived. Broadcloth, suedes, zibelines, duvetyn types have come into their own this season.

New Hats Tune to High Hairdress

Fall Millinery Styles to Be Different

There is not a dull moment in the millinery section this season. The tremendous innovations made in the launching of "wolf hats" have kept up an excitement and the adjusting of the new hats to the new high hair, or vice versa presents a challenge difficult to meet. In reality the new tiny hats are not as extreme as they seem. At least they are far more flattering than at first was thought possible.

All the way through hat fashions are different from the old order of styles. If a chapeau is not of the tiny type then it expresses its individuality, very likely in a crown that goes to a "new high." Often when a crown goes as high as it can it takes on new height in that it is trimmed with tall feathers.

Among conservative styles the tricorn is attracting considerable attention. Very smart are these three-cornered types in black felt as an autumn "fashion first."

Summing up the situation the new millinery is far the most intriguing seen for years and the versatility expressed gives assurance of a becoming hat for each and every individual type.
