"CACTUS JACK" A PRESIDENTIAL POSSIBILITY?

THERE is an American tradition to the effect that the Vice-President of the Republic shall be a man who says little and does less—an official with an imposing title and a substantial salary, but with few responsibilities and almost no authority. Some years ago a very successful stage farce was written around the idea of a vice-president named Winterbottom who kept wandering about his party headquarters and could find no one who knew or cared who he was. And, in actual history, the vice-presidency has been used more than once to "get rid" of some man whom party leaders thought too troublesome. Roosevelt the first is a case in point—he was kicked upstairs into the vice-presidency because he had made many enemies as Governor of New York, and he very likely would have been doomed to obscurity had not McKinley's assassination taken him to the White House.

"Cactus Jack" Garner seemed to be the perfect stuff of which a run-of-the-mill vice-president should be made. An able congressman, with decades of service behind him, he was known as a hard but unspectacular worker. And when he assumed his position of vice-president, he apparently took little part in politics. He wasn't often in the headlines. But now times have dramatically changed, and it is around the genial, plain figure of Jack Garner that much of today's most important political discussion is centering. He has become the great hope of the conservatives in the Democratic party—and the leader of a quiet but unrelenting "rightist rebellion" against the New Deal.

In the view of some of the most astute political commentators, the vice-president is well suited to this new role. In origin, training and experience, he is the logical representative of those millions of people of whom little is heard but who nonetheless hold the real balance of power in America—the merchant, the farmer, the rancher, the small town banker and lawyer and doctor. In political philosophy, he might be termed a conservative liberal—he believes reform should be achieved slowly and cautiously without disheartening or discouraging business. He has certain gifts of immense political importance—a nerveless patience (it is characteristic of the man that he is called the best poker player in Washington, where famous poker players abound); a vast knowledge of the techniques of political strategy; a talent for making friends; a winning, "home-spun" personality; a knack for terse, individually phrased comments on events. The latter is illustrated by a remark he is rumored to have made to the President: "You've got to give the cattle (meaning business) a chance to put some fat on their bones."

It is around Garner that the potent pro-economy group of Democratic senators has gathered. He is very close to Senator Harrison, who is leading the economy drive on the floor. He is strongly in favor of tax revision—though, like the cagey politician he is, he does his talking in the privacy of his office, and not in public. And it is universally reported that he was largely responsible for persuading the Senate to reduce the W.P.A. appropriation asked by the President to the tune of $150,000. As Time observes, "Extraordinary fact about the Garner Rebellion is that its leader does not for one minute expect to win its economy objective; as lease, not at this session of Congress." He is biding his time, getting in his licks, and planning for the future.

Highly significant is the fact that Garner now

As a citizen who is rather interested in hunting and fishing, something has come to my notice which I thought might be of interest to others who have the same interests.

Oregon state law says one may fish until one hour after sunset. As you know this time varies from day to day. For instance on the date of March 23, according to a Portland paper sunset on that day was at 6:28. That would mean that one could fish on that particular day in that zone until 7:28. We are one hour later. Naturally you would think that here the time would be 8:28 as the deadline for fishing. Such is not the case. I was informed by the game warden that astronomical time doesn't work that way. In fact instead of one hour's difference between here and Portland astronomically there is just 27 minutes between Boise and Portland. That is, sunset plus the hour allowed after occurred on that particular date at 8:20. I thought this article might save some one from an embarrassing moment.
