Your Garden

By MARY A. JAMISON

One of the glorious things of springtime is that it ferrets us out of our winter habitations into the great outdoors and close to nature—just as everything is budding out and taking on new life.

There is no reason why fences, gateways, or laundry yard lattice enclosure, for example, should be commonplace or ill-designed.

There is probably no country in the world where one can find such a large assortment of lawn and garden furniture as in the United States at the present time.

Wherever the house is built in a definite period style, the structures in the garden should be of the same period, perhaps simplified, and in most cases it will be advisable to repeat, at least partway, the materials used in building the house.

The birdhouse, though not in common usage on lawn or garden, is highly decorative and adds a touch of the unusual to the exterior.

Begin now to build the "garden of your dreams"—a place where you can have peace and quiet and the troublesome worries of this everyday world will pass by unnoticed.
