THE FINAL STRETCH
Now that vacation is over all the students should show new enthusiasm.

There are still important activities to come. All the baseball games, track and the Cinderella Ball are real things to look forward to. We hope the games will have the spirited support of all and that those in charge of the dance will get a large attendance out for a genuine good time.

Our school spirit should be shown in our school work, too. There are still semester tests coming up and we shouldn't neglect our studies. Attitude of students is usually poor after a vacation. It seems to take a few days for students to adapt themselves once more.

Let's all try to end the year right and show that we can discipline ourselves and support our school.—M. G.

Electrical Tools on Farm Are Protection Against Breakdown

For sharp tools and sound equipment, every farm needs a good workshop.

By IRA MILLER Rural Electrification Bureau

A RAINY day chore—though actually it will require several such days to complete—that is certain to pay for itself many times over and to prove its value in countless ways is to clean up and electrify the farm workshop. For, with all the machinery and equipment used in the modern business of farming, it often is vitally important that repairs be quickly made. Also, and particularly since the village blacksmith has practically disappeared from the American scene, more and more farmers have found that a well-equipped workshop saves them both time and money.

If a machine can be repaired on the farm, it will keep the men at work, eliminate the expense and time of a trip to town, possibly prevent several days' stoppage of an important operation while waiting for replacement parts, and may even be the means of saving an entire crop. Although many minor repairs—especially of a temporary nature—can be made manually, major ones usually require several power-driven tools. If the power is provided electrically, there are numerous advantages. A small electric motor—low in both original and operating cost—will run grinding wheels, lathes, drills, metal and wood saws, planers, splicers and many other tools. It also will power the blast for a forge.

Portable drills and other tools—all electrically powered—are valuable in making repairs to machinery that is too large or too heavy to be taken to the workshop or to town. Electric soldering irons, arc welders, gluepots and battery chargers also have many uses on every farm.

When needed, there is no more important building on the farm than an orderly and complete workshop. It should be adequately lighted so that, if desired, repairs can be made at night after the chores are done. The wiring and equipping of such a shop should be given serious consideration on every electrified farm—it frequently will pay for itself in a single season.
