A rockery must necessarily have the proper plants for best results. Low-growing plants are of first importance for the rockery; their actual height however, may vary much. The character of the rockery and the scale on which it is developed both have their influence. Plants to be viewed at close range should be smaller and more dainty than those seen from a distance. Large plants are often desirable in forming the background against which the smaller ones may be seen. Large plants around a rock garden may be necessary to give the seclusion that is a desirable attribute of every garden; in other places they may provide the proper setting against which the details may be seen, although in both cases they would be distinctly out of place in the rockery itself.

Permanent plants are usually used, although annuals are often very useful in beginning the rock garden. Because rockeries are more likely to be naturalistic than formal, the plant material used is generally expected to be of relatively permanent character, as, for example, herbaceous perennials and dwarf woody plants.

Often the plants native to your own section of the country can be used more appropriately than those that are introduced.

Two large groups of plants, the Sedums and Sempervivums, provide many species suitable to be grown among rocks. The Sempervivums mostly in clusters or rosettes, the Sedums trail over the rocks and especially along the crevices. The best known Sempervivums are probably the various houseleeks such as "hen and chickens." The well-known Sedums are the stonecrops, gold-moss, false houseleeks, and live forevers.

Among other plants suitable for the rockery are the perennial Alyssums; Snow in summer; some of the early flowering low-growing phloxes; dwarf irises; columbines; forget-me-nots; bell flowers; many species of pinks; and the dwarf Veronica.

In dry regions various cacti are principally depended on, supplemented especially by many of the Sedums and Sempervivum. A few cacti will stand much cold, though many are relatively tender.

At this season a number of gardens have lots of dandelions and the owners are wondering what to do about them. To control dandelions one must understand them. Dandelions spread only by seed and seedlings cannot compete with heavy sod. If you are seeding a lawn you will be repaid by putting on a little extra seed so as to be assured of heavy sod.

Where the dandelions are thick-est spray the plants with kerosene 2 quarts to 100 feet. Spray scattered plants individually or squirt a teaspoonful of kerosene into the center of each. Use an oil can for this or one of the gadgets.

Kerosene penetrates into the roots through the leaves. Spray only once a year. At about 90 degrees kerosene vaporizes, and doesn't penetrate the roots. Below 40 degrees, both the grass and dandelions are killed. So use discretion. October is considered the latest safe date for spraying.

Electric Trophy to Remain—

The bronze Reddy Kilowatt statuette mounted on a black lacquer base is to remain permanently at the Nyssa office of the Idaho Power company as proof that both Nyssa and its surrounding communities are increasingly becoming electrically conscious.

The statue was presented to this office the first part of 1938 as a prize for going over the top in electrical sales in a campaign ending in December 1937. But was not to become a permanent award until another years electrical sales had proved this office as leader again.

This Bernard Frost and his Nyssa force have accomplished and the Idaho Power has now permanently awarded to the Nyssa office the figurine of Reddy Kilowatt.
