SEVEN POINTS TO SOMETHING OR OTHER

ACCORDING to the Idaho Statesman, Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, turns loose upon a waiting (?) world, seven points that he says are necessary to stabilize agriculture.

We take the seven points, one by one.
First, Mr. Wallace says that the farmer "must get a fair share of the national income."

We wonder if he thinks that he is lending his support to this essential requirement, when he shuts off the American farmer from more than twenty-five per cent of the domestic sugar market? He is one of the coterie of lip service politicians that believes in protecting the American farmers markets just so long as the "big money" people are not hurt.

Two. Soil fertility must be maintained and improved. Well, there is not much in that point. Farmers are a lot more anxious to maintain the fertility of their soil than anyone else would be, and as far as we know have done a good job of it in the past—they have had to or lose their farms.

Three. Supplies and prices of farm products must be stable from year to year, on a basis fair to farmers and consumers. If politicians would get it into their heads that the best way to maintain equitable prices to consumer and farmer, is to stop gambling in farm products, and do something about it—in the way of putting an end to gambling by curbing wheat pits and kindred thievery, both the farmer and the consumer would benefit.

Four. Farmers must continue to improve their efficiency so as to match the efficiency of the people in the towns and cities.

Wallace fails to ring the bell on this one. He accuses the American sugar beet growers of being inefficient, based on a dollars and cents cost of production. About the only comparison that he has to base this assumption on is with off-shore production. In the Philippines for instance, laborers are getting sixty cents a day. Yet in the United States the sugar beet growers are bound by law to pay their field workers many times that amount. Efficiency, indeed!

Five. Farmers must have as nearly as possible security of tenure on farms which for the most part are family sized.

All that we can add to this is Amen.

Six. The co-operative way of buying, selling and living should be brought to pass as fast as it can be demonstrated to be genuinely efficient and in line with the understanding and training of the people.

To the buying and selling objective we take no issue. But on this matter of "co-operative living"—we wonder. Surely Mr. Wallace was not thinking of Socialistic or Communistic trend when he thought this one up? If he did we would like to bet a plugged nickel to a doughnut that he will have a tough time trying to get two or more of our average American farm wives to share the same kitchen stove or washing machine together!

Seven. Farmers must develop a love for the soil and for farming as a way of life which rises superior to the old-fashioned concept of farming as a way of exploitation and speculation.

With our association of farmers we have yet to find one who had the least idea of "exploitation and speculation." As for the love of the soil—certainly a farmer must have it. For how else could a person work year in and year out, some years with no return for the labor, and others just enough to carry him over to the next, without he had this "love of the soil."

Better come again Mr. Wallace, but take a look around at our American citizens on the farms, first!

The Savior of men longs to tell you that you are more momentous in His sight than the six sextillion tons that represent the weight of the earth—and were they tons of gold. He pleads with you to take the sins that are keeping you from God and to bring everyone of them to the foot of the cross, there in the grief of repentance and contrition, but with the joy of faith and trust, to behold the sin-bearer of the ages and believe that a gracious God forgives and pardons, heals and cures. If you have turned your back to Christ, now lift a penitent face to His mercies. If you have known your Savior and have forgotten Him, renew the blessed companionship without delay. Let us help you through our services.

COW HOLLOW

By The Happy Farmer

Tis Monday again and our canal still holds. It makes us feel like there must be a higher power guiding here for those who have viewed the "big bad" place in the canal all have said that it was beyond human power to hold it.

The rabbit poisoning demonstration the county agent put on for Cow Hollow two weeks ago was a huge success even far beyond anybody's hopes. We would guess that even with the county agent it was more of an experiment.

There were four Cow Hollow farmers helping Chuck Share finish stacking hay the day the county agent was to demonstrate. They were hurrying to finish up two of the five wanted to go to the demonstration. Some said it was just a waste of time for the rabbits would not not eat poisoned alfalfa when they could just as well eat our growing crops.

The county agent told us to cut fresh young alfalfa about 5 o'clock in the evening and poison it and get it out for them before it had time to wilt. That theory sounded reasonable alright.

We followed instructions and put the poison out Saturday evening. On Monday the agent was out here and was well pleased with the number of rabbits killed but more poison was not available so it was decided to have a big rabbit drive the following Saturday. But the rabbits continued to eat the poisoned hay even though it had dried or cured up.

On Thursday he was out again to make final preparations for the drive. He and his assistant walked through the brush and decided there was not enough rabbits left to justify making a drive.

The rabbits continued to eat and die as long as there was any poisoned hay left.

Some of the farmers have purchased more poison and put it out for them.

You drive up the Cow Hollow trail about sundown now and you can sure miss the rabbits although there is still plenty left.

Farming in Cow Hollow is looking up now and the farmers are feeling much better. The water is still in the canal. The rabbits are thinned out some. The first cutting of hay is up in fine shape and now when two farmers meet about the first question asked is "when are you going to cut your second cutting of hay?" The second cutting is coming on and promises to be fine.

The clover seed prospects don't look so good but there is not so much clover in Cow Hollow. Jim Trummel has more clover than all the rest of the Hollow. But Jim doesn't put all his eggs in one basket, he has wheat, barley and potatoes also. So if clover doesn't do too well he still will live.

Chet Sage claims to have raised the first apricots raised in Cow Hollow. He was looking at his young trees the other day and was somewhat surprised to find two apricots on one little tree.

Russell Howell purchased and set out some fruit trees quite late this spring. A small cherry tree had a number of blossoms already out on it. Russell watched those blossoms with much interest. A few of them developed into small cherries and two of the cherries matured.

Russell was boasting of his cherry crop and Frank Parker took the wind out of his sails by saying, "that's not so great, I can go you one better. My tree had three cherries on it."

Mrs. Clarence Niccum thinks that up to date her garden has been the heaviest producing garden in Cow Hollow. Since the first greens in the spring her garden has been a plentiful source of supply. Besides dividing some with the neighbors, she has canned 53 quarts of peas and is selling some to some of the neighbors and now has gree beans to can.

There has been three loads of poles come into Cow Hollow in the last few days. Jack and Don Parker brought in a big load of poles July 2.

Russell Howell received a load July 9 and Elza Niccum one July 10.

The ladies club is giving a birthday dinner for the families of the members. The dinner is in honor of birthdays of Mrs. Roy Rookstool and Mrs. Doc Raffington and at the Raffington home.

George Gabriel is hoeing his corn. George says that there isn't going to be as many thistles this winter on his farm as there was last.

Dude Parker has lost three head of young cattle this summer two with bloat and one just disappeared. He thinks it must have fallen in the canal and drowned.
