Your Garden
By MARY A. JAMISON

So long that it is not recorded, gardeners have increased their plants by division, by root cutting, by branch cutting and leaf cutting. Most of our daily needs in that line are old practice in England and America. Now comes an expert from the Institute of Plant Research who says that 100 per cent of all growing things can be propagated by division or cuttings as soon as we know the exact conditions required by the individual plant. And slowly, with infinite pains and endless experiment, this is being proved.

What an interesting thing it would be to compare experiences in making slips from plants, shrubs, and trees. Almost every gardener has tried it and succeeded as well as failed.

It has been customary to take cuttings a foot long or longer after the leaves have fallen or late in October or November, set them deep in the garden loam and wait till spring, when they will usually be found to be well rooted. Now some are propagating by taking cuttings from these same deciduous trees, vines and shrubs, while they are in full leaf. The growing ends are taken, removing only those leaves which would decay if covered by the sand in which they are to be planted. All other leaves remain, for they supply the elaborate sap which makes root growth. Clean sand, a warm, shaded propagating house or frame, and roots appear in from eight days to a month or longer, according to the kind of cutting. Of course great care is taken to cut clean with a sharp knife and not to bruise. Also to cut just below the node or bud, and to trim off the top just above a bud.

Propagating frames in great nurseries are full of cuttings from May till August, sometimes on through till October.

The border pinks, the sweet William in fact all dianthus are prime for cutting on an early June day. Two or three inches cut just below a node is right, though sweet William can be longer. Trim clean with sharp knife or scissors halfway up. Set the cutting in clean sand and two to four weeks will see a root system well begun.

Chrysanthemums, the hardy aster, belenium can all be started from cuttings.

Columbine can be divided in early spring or late fall, but it is easy to grow from seed and comes true to name. The clump does well for years and years without division so why divide?

Delphinium after the third year is ready for division. Lift the plant after its first June blooming has been cut back to an inch or so, break apart with the hands or a sharp spade, discarding the dead center and pieces of wastage. Set out like new plants in rich sandy loam well worked with bone meal.

Iris is ready to divide soon after blooming. Each rhizome will make a new clump; even the one which has blossomed for the last time will develop young rhizomes at the leaf axils of the old rhizome. July or late June is a good time for early and intermediate iris to be divided.

Oriental poppies will not come true to seed. If you never have divided an Oriental poppy without disturbing the main clump you will find it an interesting process.

Dig away the dirt till two or three big tawny roots are exposed, cut them off a couple of inches below the crown and repack the earth about the plant. Do the same on the other side. Now cut the roots you have severed into short pieces an inch or so in length. But be sure to remember which is the upper end. Plant them around the parent plant or in a nursery bed about two inches below the surface and firm well. Be sure to plant them right side up.

Oriental poppies must be cut and rooted when dormant and that is usually August. Such root cuttings will bloom the following year and absolutely true in color.

Peonies are divided in the fall only and according to the eyes. One to each root division will do well but three are much better.

Another interesting propagation from our hardy border is that of Lillium candidum, our Madonna lily. The scales or leaflets from the bulbs may be planted and they will form bulbs. The flowering stem may be buried and it will form bulbs but this must be done as soon as it has finished flowering.

And so it is throughout the garden. But it takes time—and patience.

ON THE STAGE AT THE NYSSA THEATRE, THURSDAY, JULY 27

The Nyssa Theatregoers will have a rare opportunity to see and hear one of the county's best hillbilly orchestras next Thursday when Walt Shrum and his Colorado Hillbillies will appear on the stage. In Shrum's orchestra is such talent as "Lil" Abner Wilder, whose fame is not confined to the banjo, on which he is conceded an artist, but also in the role of comedian "Lil" Abner adds spice and variety to the program.

Tony Fiore, wizard of the accordion, has been featured with the Rudy Valley Variety Hour and the famous Hollywood cafe, the Trocadero.

The orchestra is composed of eight members and J. B. Geizentanner assures the public that there is a full evening of high class entertainment in store for them.

COW HOLLOW

By The Happy Farmer

The ladies Wahine club at their last meeting, decided that instead of having a birthday dinner once a month they would make it an ice cream social for a while. They held their first social last Sunday evening at the Doc Raffington home.

It had been decided for each member to bring a cake and one gallon of cream ready to freeze. The Cow Hollow farmers have begun to talk about who is going to combine their grain now. To date there is none quite ready to cut.

Bill Parker is the first one in the hollow to cut his second cutting of hay but the next two weeks will find most all of Cow Hollow hay cut.

The Malheur county cow tester was here Monday with reports of the tests he made a few days ago. Elza Niccum showed a clean test but Clarence Niccum's bunch showed three bad ones out of four.

Clarence thinks the trouble was all caused by one cheap "bargain" cow he purchased last winter. Now has not only lost his "bargain" cow, but he has lost what he thinks was the best cow in the hollow. He says for a milk cow she was worth a whole pasture full like the "bargain" cow.

Resolved: Never to buy another cheap "bargain" cow or any cow without her being tested for abortion.

Dale Limbaugh, whose grain is ready to cut, brought in a bunch of feeder pigs from Emmett.

Doc Raffington, Mort Wiekson, George Gabriel and Clarence Niccum are discussing building a portable "Jin Pole" hay derrick that they can easily move from one farm to another.

Arch Eastman plans to go to the hills for a load of poles the latter part of the week.

Elza Niccum's pond as a swimming pool has been quite a popular place.

Mr. and Mrs. Russell Howell, Mr. and Mrs. Chuck Shear and a few other Cow Hollowites have been going out looking for fruit to can the past week.

Our young fruit trees, of which there is quite a number in the hollow will in a few years bring our fruit to us instead of us having to go out for it.

Vacation On Coast—
Mr. and Mrs. Carlos Buchner are enjoying a two weeks' vacation at the coast.
