Ye Snooper's Column

Things About Nyssa's Shops

We did speak with the friends this past week and in the conversation came the question of whether or not a so-called notorious woman may ever overcome her reputation and live usefully and respected again in the everyday world. Some felt not. We ourselves know that it can be done.

True it is not easy. This return again to respectability and the esteem and friendship of Mr. and Mrs. Average citizen, for many there are who will always add a boot instead of a boost to the transgressor when they start on that upward climb.

If it is only the warm smile of friendly recognition that one gives, to such a one it is as a warm sun shining through a dark fog of mental misery. It warms their souls and helps them keep the faith, in a world gone wrong.

She was a dainty, fun loving lass. This woman in the long ago, with a figure neater than any present day glamor girl's, eyes deep brown but flecked with the golden light of the sun as was her hair, hanging in heavy braids far past her tiny waist. And shoes number 2 1/2 were not too small for the little feet. But her hands even then might have been called capable, and in later years were to prove it. Proved the courage and will of this woman to be.

Happily she tethered the cow on the pasture below the house attended the grade school or visited at a coffee Klatch with the mutter. For they were German folk, hard working, thrifty meticulously clean and strong in their family affection.

Then the mother passed away leaving this child, turning to womanhood, in the old rambling home alone with the aging father. The sisters and brothers were married and none had a place for this woman-child.

She started on her own and found work in the city. A steamstess' helper and apprentice. But the earnings were too meagre for more than a mere existence and she wanted more from life than that. Wanted to dance and to sing and to play, wanted nice clothes and a boy friend. And of course some day a husband and a home and little ones as every girl does and regretfully.

Then she met him. A doctor of shady repute. Much older than herself. A man of good birth of fine manners and much of this world's goods. She became his office nurse, and in time lived with him without benefit of law nor clergy. The little girl became a young lady of 22, polished too, wise in the ways of the world. Had her own car and fur coats and jewels. Traveled and lived in fine hotels.

Then into this man's office one day came another woman. A school teacher too young and inexperienced too, the partial support of her parents, a girl with spotless reputation from a small town up the country. But heavy hearted now and burdened with shame and a knowledge that ere school opened again she would be an unwed mother. In fact already she had fears that those in authority suspected her. So she came for such aid as this man gave and empty handed for his price was high and she had no savings, had nothing to offer for his services but the promise to pay.

And in pity for her he operated on her without charge.

She died of hemorrhage on the table in the little office surgery with none present but the doctor. He was panic stricken. In all the years of this unlawful business nothing like this had happened. It meant prison or worse. And disgrace to the old father and mother in the east. This above all must be averted. Against the pleadings of the girl, with the help of an officer by the body was hidden.

Like a maddened frightened animal he took to flight and the girl with him, pleading always that he return and take the consequences. He refused. In flight lay safety. But it did not.

In the gray mountain dawn at a little wayside inn came the law. For both of them. She had not thought of this.

Back to the city and hours and days of questioning for both of them but particularly for the girl. She would not tell. She cared for this man and her sense of loyalty and and fairplay would not let her tell the things she knew. Not even to save herself. But they did break her staunch spirit. And she did tell. Things that she knew would send this man who had been so kind to her through so many years to the penitentiary perhaps for life.

And the laws penalty for him was 15 years. Fifteen years behind bars and cold walls. For her came freedom. But gone was the joy of living. Gone friends and luxuries. The home she had known, the protection the man had given her. Once again she was alone untrained for self support. Alone in a disdainful, resentful and relentless society.

None would give her work. Old friends shunned her. Her name gave her away at every turn, her picture had been blazoned on every front page. And there were no funds to start in new fields.

But always there are some who see beneath. See a soul quivering in shamed anguish. See the good that may be saved. This time it was another doctor friend. A man of influence and large practice. Through him she was admitted to training for a nurse in one of the city's leading hospitals. But only on the condition that she make good under her own name.

And make good she did. Through three years of hard duty, long hours, perhaps 12 on duty through a busy day without relief, then a sudden demand to relieve a sick night nurse, 10, 12 hours or more spent in a hot nauseous surgery to go off duty, to drop into bed, feet swollen from long standing, head splitting because she was too tired to eat at meal time and then in the stillness of night to be called out again, an emergency. A half day a week respite if she was lucky, two extra hours on Sunday afternoon.

But the hospital is a busy place and people come and go and take each one for what they are worth and more and more her worth was mounting. Till at the end of her three years she was one of the most popular graduates both with the patients and with her daily associates.

But life yet had not taken the full toll. Had not melted all the frost from the gold.

In the last year of her training, while she was assisting at the office in the early morning hours, an accident case was brought in and the officer who investigated, a brawny, black haired Irishman with a twinkling blue eye say this nurse and fell in love. 'Twas not long before the hospital corridors buzzed with this new love affair and all hoped that the wedding would come soon.

Came the day that it was announced and they went with the good doctor friend and his wife to the church where the girl embraced the man's faith, was blessed by the priest and radiantly happy started down the steps on the arm of her husband to be. Only to be met by his wrathful sister who when she had done talking had ruined the happiness for years to come of the other two. There was no wedding.

Only long days and long nights of heart sick misery and loneliness. But by and by the sun did shine again. And in a little mountain town another man who loved her greatly, who when he learned the truth concerning her, still it made no difference. "Not what is ahead," he said, "but what is behind." They were wed.

Then came a baby daughter and the cup of the girls joy ran over.

Today that little one is grown to young womanhood, lovely as a summer dawn and as unspooled. She is a solo dancer with a fine ballet. And the mother is with her, helping not only her own daughter but other mother's daughters as well to keep a straight and sane path. No one remembers the old story. Times has healed that wound as it does all others if we will just be still and let it.

She is among the thousands who each year find themselves on the wrong road of life and through unbelievable sacrifice and effort scramble up again into the right way.

We knew her well. She was our roommate and we loved her much from front page. And there were no funds to start in new fields.
