Eubank, in the New York Sun.

THIRD TERM controversies could be easily eliminated, if that is the desire of the majority of the voters in the United States, by the simple expedient of our Congress drafting such a law and putting it into effect.

Such action on the part of Congress would undoubtedly raise as much fuss as the bill packing of the Supreme Court caused. A bill of that nature, if it limited the term of office of the President to two terms, or for one term of say six years, would without doubt go a long way toward eliminating the office from politics.

This six year term idea has been worked out quite successfully in some of our southern states where the governor can only hold office for that length of time (six years) and it seems to be a very good idea.

It seems silly to hear a person (especially if that person happens to be a politician) say that he or she is not seeking a political office, and rather refreshing to hear another come out in plain English and say that he wants this or that office. The former type is the one who is looking for all the power that the sought for office will give him, the latter type, is the unusual and makes the better office-holder of the two, for he is seeking the office in an open and honest manner.

If such a limitation were placed on the tenure of office of the President it would allow for all time the possibility or the basis for a charge that the office holder was seeking to perpetuate himself in office as a dictator.
