MALHEUR COUNTY

(Oregon's Sugar Bowl)

FOR CANNING

White Satin SUGAR

In southeastern Oregon, where nature drew her map on a huge scale, so that every citizen could cut himself an ample slice, lies Malheur County. With the blessings of millions of cubic feet of impounded water from the gigantic Owyhee Dam (next to Boulder Dam the highest in the U. S.), and distributed via the longest gravity flume canal in the world, nature has been made to "blossom as a rose." In Malheur County and adjacent regions are 660,000 acres of irrigable land. This is larger than northern Colorado with its eleven large beet sugar factories. Ideal for sugar beet raising, Malheur County is the potential "sugar bowl" of the northwest. Already located in Malheur county is the newest and most modern beet sugar factory in America, producing an unexcelled product which brings to Oregon more than $3,500,000 in new wealth annually. Here is a land for settlers! A paradise for livestock growers. A rich game country. The future home of vastly larger industries of every kind. Malheur, we salute you, great in achievement, greater in possibilities.

FACTS ABOUT MALHEUR COUNTY
Leading county in the U. S. in production of red clover seed, in alfalfa, and in field seed corn. Approximately $3,000,000 is already scheduled for new construction here in 1940. The Nyssa sugar beet district showed the highest sugar beet yield per acre of any large sugar beet acreage in the U. S. in 1938.
