Chickens Yield Higher Returns In Electrified Poultry Houses

Lights for poultry cost from 1/10 to 3/10 cents per bird per month.

By IRA MILLER
Farm Electrification Bureau

THE coming of high-line electricity should mean more to most farmers than just the installation and use of city conveniences in the farm home. However, in the natural excitement of enjoying new-found home comforts, many families overlook—or neglect for a considerable period—the large number of equally-important and often more-profitable "industrial" uses of electricity on the farm. Yet even one "business" application of electricity frequently will return sufficient profit to pay not only for itself but also for all household services as well.

One of the lowest-cost but best-paying of the numerous uses of electricity on the farmstead is in the poultry house during fall and winter. Lights, water warmers and, in many localities, resistance heaters with fan circulation, will not only yield more eggs when prices are highest but also will help to maintain the health of the flock.

When days are short, lights are essential to high egg production. Hens require about 14 hours of light per day to lay regularly, whereas the average daily amount of light during the winter season—about 10 hours—permits them to eat but little more food than is necessary to maintain body weight. By using electric lights to artificially increase the working day and thus give them a normal amount of time to exercise and eat, hens can be maintained at approximately uniform laying efficiency throughout the year.

In general, lights are needed from about September 1 to April 1. Although ordinary light bulbs are most frequently employed, the use of ultra-violet lamps has gained much favor in recent years. The latter also furnish invisible radiations which supply the necessary amount of Vitamin D, thus making for stronger, healthier and more rapid-growing birds as well as for more eggs with a higher percentage of fertility and greater hatchability.

Much if not all of the benefits of artificial lighting will be lost if the hens are not provided with an adequate and regular supply of water at the proper temperature—50 to 55 degrees. The safest and most convenient method of warming the water is with electrical heaters, of which there are several kinds. In general, the immersion type with thermostat control is preferred because of its ease of handling and freedom from attention.

Lights and water warmers must be used consistently and at the same hours each day if they are to be effective. Should a change be made in the lighting schedule, it must be done gradually to avoid a rapid decline in egg production. The cost of the wiring, equipment and power is relatively small when compared with the added profits that result—a net gain of 25 to 50 cents per hen per year being easily realized.

Cox is now attending A. V. school.

Pire of unknown origin destroyed the entire wardrobe of the Pete Huffman family Monday. Some damage was done to the house in which they lived.

Mr. and Mrs. Carl Wagner and Mrs. Carl Field of Nampa visited at the Alex Wagner home Sunday.
