Mass Production Comes to Aircraft Industry

The above drawing of Vultee Aircraft's mechanized final assembly line shows the revolutionary production developments at the California plant in the last few months. It is the graphic story of how modern airplanes are made compared to the methods of but a year or two ago, and shows the first mechanized assembly line in the aircraft industry.

Instead of the old system of adding one part at a time to a framework and gradually building up a complete plane, Vultee breaks the ship down into five major units—fuselage, tail section, engine assembly, center wing section and outer wings. Each is completely put together in sub-assembly departments. Conveyor lines reach out finger-like to

At the right of the picture, tail sections are assembled, complete with monocoque, stabilizers, rudders, elevators and control cables, and move around on tracks to the center. Meanwhile, at the left, skeleton fuselages travel through assembly stages on a long U-shaped conveyor rail, winding up close to their starting point, complete with instruments, controls, canopies, wiring, etc. A short rail section then moves them across to the finishing line where they join the completed tail sections.

sembly departments. Meanwhile, at the upper left of the picture, on a balcony, another assembly line is joining motor with engine mount and attaching controls, piping and other "plumbing." A chain-driven overhead conveyor carries the complete engine assemblies high overhead to the center of the picture where they drop from a hoist to the planes below. Farther down, outer wings come through the paint shop to be attached to the ships. Beyond that point controls are adjusted, final inspection made, and Vultee planes roll out of the shop and "into the blue."

This new mechanized conveyor line has increased Vultee production fourfold in the last few months.
