VALUE OF BATTLESHIP DECLINES

Whether the Russians' claim that they hit the German battleship, Tirpitz, with a torpedo is true or false, it at least brings to the attention of the world again that the battleship is losing its place in the sun.

The Tirpitz has been kept out of action for many months by repeated attacks of British torpedo planes and dive-bombers. Like its sister ships, the 40,000 ton super-dread-naught has not played an important part in the war, except, perhaps to keep a few English planes and ships in England, when they could have been of more value somewhere else.

The less useful the large battleship becomes through development of the airplane, the more important the plane will become in this war. That is one reason the united nations are certain of winning the war if given time. England is said to be manufacturing as many planes as Germany and the United States is reported to be making as many as Japan, Italy and Germany so that soon, despite the preparedness of the dictators over a period of years, the allied air force should soon excel that of the axis powers.

FOURTH OF JULY TRAFFIC FATALITIES REDUCED IN 1942

Even war seems to bring about some good results.

The traffic fatalities in the United States during the Fourth of July holidays were only about half the number of persons killed on the highways last year. The total this year was slightly over 300.

The effect of the war on traffic accidents was indirect, but never-the-less it was effective. The gasoline and automobile tire rationing has forced many motorists off the highways and reduced the number of possible accidents.

The poor condition of many tires and the desire of automobile owners to conserve their tires are factors that have reduced traffic speeds, which, in the past, have taken a frightful toll of lives.

When the world goes crazy in war, it becomes sensible in other ways.
