Here's the Way Leathernecks Go Ashore

United States Marines go ashore in style—towing a 37 mm anti-tank gun behind them. The Leathernecks have at last found a car that will take all the knocks a Marine must take in fighting the Devil Dog type of warfare. This "jeep" took part in a recent Leatherneck landing maneuver.

At The National Capital

Washington, D. C., August 20. A new order on buses may be of immense benefit to various Oregon communities. It gives office of defense transportation control of all buses not disposed of and those to be built. Getting workers to and from war work is becoming increasingly difficult not only at Portland but at Corvallis and Medford. Under the new arrangement a bus for the city can be purchased through ODT, with a proviso that when ODT wishes to send it to some other section it can do so. A bus, in this arrangement, is ever under the control of ODT and will probably bear the ODT insignia.

A city bus cannot operate more than 2000 miles a month, about 65 miles a day. Grant Pass, sending workers to the Medford cantonment, or Salem sending workers to the cantonment at Corvallis or Salem to Portland shipyards are eligible to an intercity bus, which is limited to 4000 miles a month. These limitations are made to preserve tires for what may be the duration. If ODT decides that a bus is needed somewhere else the first purchaser is paid the first cost of the bus minus a small percentage for each month the bus has operated.

The war department refuses to store all its aviation gasoline in one spot on Columbia river. The planes at Walla Walla, Pendleton and Pasco will each have their own gasoline storage facilities. Ordinarily, in peace time, says the war department, it would be good business to consolidate the supplies at a convenient spot, but war presents a different picture and costs are forgotten. The war policy is to distribute gasoline depots and thus make it more difficult for an enemy to destroy the supply. A suggestion was made that a storage be located on the river bank at Umatilla.

Shortage of lumberjacks in the Oregon woods has reached a point where the war department, manpower commission and U.S. employment service are trying to figure how relief can be given. One suggestion is that soldiers be sent into the woods, as in the first world war when the spruce division filled the forests along the Oregon coast and back into the mountains. Labor organizations, however, have protested use of soldiers, who would draw soldiers' pay, which is much less than a lumberjack receives from his logging boss.

An Oregon sawmill operator came to the national capital last week to ask for a priority on sufficient copper wire to connect his mill with a transmission line. He had to travel 6000 miles and pay railroad fare of about $250 and a hotel bill in Washington. Then the priorities board informed him that it was not his place to ask for a priority but the company from which he hoped to obtain electricity.
