PANTELLERIA VICTORY ENCOURAGING

One of the most encouraging battles of the war for the allied nations since Japan's sneak attack on Pearl harbor was the capture of Pantelleria, one of the military stepping-stones to Italy a few days ago.

The united nations' victory was especially encouraging and interesting because the island people surrendered, with Il Duce's permission, before a soldier set foot on the island. In other words, the surrender was brought about entirely by air forces, with the assistance of the navy.

Proof that battles can be won almost entirely by air power is particularly pleasing to adherents of the united nations, because the allies have gained air superiority over the axis and are contemplating invasion of Europe.

No one would be so rash as to state that the Pantelleria victory means Europe could be conquered by air power alone, but the triumph shows what terrifying effect bombing has upon a people and how completely they can be "softened up" for land invasion.

As a side issue of the discussion, it appears now that Italy will soon be hoisting the white flag of surrender. When she loses Sicily and Sardinia she will be very vulnerable to attack.

LABOR'S ENEMY

His hatred of Roosevelt has impelled John L. Lewis to become labor's greatest enemy—not vocally but actually. His recent actions have severely penalized all labor. No hired stooge or lobbyist for the labor-haters could do the job for them more efficiently. If the Smith-Connally bill becomes law it will be due to his cussedness, which has so aroused public resentment against labor generally as to give many members of congress an excuse to vote for drastic measures which they were formerly afraid to support for fear of offending labor.—Capital Press, Salem.

Canning Couldn't Be Easy!

"Not for me, I used to say. No siree—canning is too hard. Then along came the war, and I found I'd have to can if I wanted to make sure my family would have the right foods. And no fooling—preserving foods is a whole lot easier than I ever would have guessed."

Are you canning for the first time this year? Lots of homemakers are, and it will help your country as much as anything you could do to help win the war!

No Matter Which Method You Prefer ... Be Sure to Preserve Food This Year!

PRESSURE COOKING: All non acid foods must be canned by the pressure cooker method. Meats and poultry, and the vegetables that may harbor botulinus must be canned by this method if you are to can them at all. Only by the use of the pressure cooker can you get the 240 to 250 degree temperature necessary to kill botulinus. So, if you want to preserve peas, beans, carrots, asparagus, corn or leafy vegetables—and don't have access to a pressure cooker, you should dehydrate them, brine them or quick freeze them.

FREEZING: All commonly grown fruits and vegetables can be safely stored by the quick freeze method. Deep cold kills botulinus as effectively as extreme heat. Vegetables must first be blanched as for canning—and they should be cooled quickly in ice water or cold running water for one minute before packing into cartons, and frozen within one hour. Do not blanch fruits—just prepare as you would for the table, removing skins or stems. Work sugar gently through berries. Prepare poultry as for cooking—singe, clean, dress.

DEHYDRATING: A tested and approved method to safely preserve garden fruits and vegetables—provided it is done properly. Idaho Power Company offices will gladly supply plan sheets for building your own home dehydrator and give other valuable information about this comparatively simple method.
