STUDIES POST-WAR FARMING

Conservation of the nation's soil will continue to be the No. 1 agricultural problem in the post-war period, according to testimony by Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard and War Food Administrator Marvin Jones, before a special congressional committee on post-war policy.

Both farm officials urged the expansion of conservation programs already in operation and that suitable surplus war machinery be made available to farmers for constructing terraces, drainage and irrigation ditches, stock watering ponds, and other needed conservation development. It was stressed at the hearing before the committee that wise use of water through soil treatment, contour plowing, cover cropping, strip cropping and other conservation farming practices, as well as the construction of such developments as ponds and dams, are closely related to the conservation and rebuilding of the soil. Virtually all of the conservation practices discussed at the hearings are ones which congress, through the agricultural adjustment agency, has been assisting and encouraging an ever-increasing number of farmers to perform themselves.

WICKARD DISCUSSES DEMAND

Effective and permanent demand for farm products, Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard told the congressional committee, will require full employment at fair wages, assistance to low-income families in obtaining more food and textile products, and a reasonable level of farm exports. Dominant aims of agricultural policy after the war in addition to the conservation of the nation's oil resources should include, according to Wickard, full production at maximum efficiency, equal living standards for farm and city families, equal protection for all types of farmers, conservation and improvement of forest resources, encouragement of the family-stead
